

A PRACTICAL DISCOURSE CONCERNING
DEATH.

~~~~~*~~~~~
BY WILLIAM SHERLOCK, D. D.
~~~~~*~~~~~

FROM THE SEVENTEENTH GLASGOW EDITION.

ALBANY :

PRINTED AND SOLD BY PRATT & DOUBLEDAY,
No. 1. LION-STREET.

.....
1814.

L.H.S.

RECEIVED
JAN 11 1891
VOLUME 1

TO DR. SHERLOCK, ON HIS DISCOURSE CONCERNING DEATH.

FORGIVE the muse, who, in unhallow'd strains,
'The saint one moment from his God detains.
For sure whate'er you do, whate'er you are,
'Tis all but one good work, one constant prayer.
Forgive her, and intreat that God to whom Thy favored vows with kind acceptance come,
'To raise her notes to that sublime degree,
That suits a song of piety and thee.

Wond'rous good man ! Whose labors may repel
The force of sin, may stop the rage of hell :
Who, like the baptist, from thy God was sent,
The crying voice to bid the world repent.

Thee youth shall study ; and no more engage
His flattering wishes for uncertain age ;
No more, with fruitless care, and cheated strife,
Chase fleeting pleasure through the maze of life ;
Finding the wretched all he here can have,
But present food, and but a future grave ;
Each, great as Philip's victor son, shall view
This abject world, and weeping ask a new.

Decrepid age shall read thee, and confess Thy labors can assuage where med'cines cease ;
Shall bless thy words, their wounded souls' relief ;
The drops that sweeten their last dregs of life ;
Shall look to heav'n, and laugh at all beneath ;
Own riches gather'd, trouble ; fame a breath,
And life, an ill, whose only cure is death. }

Thy even thoughts with so much plainness flow,
Their sense untutor'd infancy may know :
Yet to such height is all that plainness wrought,
Wit may admire, and letter'd pride be taught.
Easy in words thy style, in sense sublime ;

On its blest steps each age and sex may rise ;
'Tis like the ladder in the patriarch's dream,

Its foot on earth, its height beyond the skies.
 Diffus'd its virtue, boundless is its pow'r ;
 'Tis public health and universal cure.
 Of heav'nly manna, 'tis a second feast,
 A nation's food, and all to ev'ry taste.

To its last height, mad Britain's guilt was rear'd,
 And various deaths for various crimes she fear'd ;
 With your kind work her drooping hopes revive,
 You bid her read, repent, adore, and live.
 You rest the bolt from heaven's avenging hand,
 Stop ready death, and save a sinking land.

O save us still, still bless us with thy stay,
 O ! want thy heaven, till we have learn'd the way,
 Refuse to leave thy destin'd charge too soon,
 And for the church's good, defer thy own :
 O ! live, and let thy works urge our belief,
 Live to explain thy doctrine by thy life,
 Till future infancy baptized by thee
 Grow ripe in years, and old in piety,
 'Till christians yet unborn be taught to die.

Then full of age, and hoary holiness,
 Retire, great teacher, to thy promis'd bliss ;
 Untouch'd thy tomb, uninjur'd be thy dust,
 As thy own fame among the future just,
 'Till in last sounds the dreaded trumpet speaks,
 'Till judgment calls, and quicken'd nature wakes,
 'Till through the utmost earth and deepest sea,
 Our scatter'd atoms find their destin'd way,
 In haste to clothe their kindred souls again,
 Perfect our state, and build immortal man :
 Then fearless, thou, who well sustain'd the fight,
 To paths of joy, and tracts of endless light,
 Lead up all those, that heard thee, and believ'd :
 'Midst thy own flock, great shepherd, be receiv'd ;
 And glad all heav'n with millions thou hast sav'd.

M. PRIOR.

TO THE WORSHIPFUL
THE MASTERS OF THE BENCH,
And the rest of the Members of the two Honorable SOCIETIES.
OF THE TEMPLE.

My much honored Friends,

ONE reason of publishing this plain discourse is, because I cannot now preach to you, as formerly I have done, and have no other way left of discharging my duty to you, but by making the press supply the place of the pulpit. Part of this you have already heard, and should have heard the rest, had I enjoyed the same liberty still ; which God restore to me again, when he sees fit ; if not his will be done.

And the only reason of this dedication is, to make this public and thankful acknowledgement (before I am forced from you, if I must be so unhappy) of your

- SECT. V. The time, and manner, and circumstances of every particular man's death, is not determined by an absolute and unconditional decree. 150
- SECT. VI. The particular time when we are to die, is unknown and uncertain to us. 159
- SECT. VII. That we must die but once ; or that death translates us to an unchangeable state with the improvement of it. 188

CHAP. IV.

- Concerning the fear of death, and the remedies against it.* 261
- The conclusion.* 279

A

PRACTICAL DISCOURSE

CONCERNING

DEATH.

HEBREWS ix. 27.

It is appointed unto men once to die.

THE INTRODUCTION.

THERE is not a more effectual way to revive the true spirit of christianity in the world, than seriously to meditate on what we commonly call the four last things, death, judgment, heaven and hell ; for it is morally impossible men should live such careless lives, should so wholly devote themselves to this world, and the service of their lusts, should either cast off the fear of God, and all reverence for his laws, or satisfy themselves with some cold and formal devotions, were they possest with a warm and constant sense of these things. For what manner of men ought we to be, who know that we must shortly die, and come to judgment, and receive according to what we have done in this world, whether it be good or evil ; either eternal rewards in the kingdom of heaven, or eternal punishments with the devil and his angels.

That which first presents itself to our thoughts, and shall be the subject of this following treatise, is death, a very terrible thing, the very naming of which is apt to chill our blood and spirits, and to draw a dark veil over all the glories of this life. And yet this is the condition of all mankind, we must as surely die, as we are born : for it is appointed unto men once to die. This is not the original law of our nature ; for though man was made of the dust of the earth, and therefore was by nature mortal, (for that which is made of dust is by nature corruptible, and may be resolved into dust again) yet had he not sinned, he should never have died ; he should have been immortal by grace, and therefore had the sacrament of immortality, the tree of life, planted in paradise ; but now by man sin entered into the world, and death by sin ; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned, Rom. v. 12. And thus it is decreed and appointed by God, by an irreversible sentence, dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return.

Now to improve this meditation to the best advantage, I shall, I. Consider what death is, and what wisdom that should teach us. II. The certainty of our death. That it is appointed unto men once to die.

III. The time of our death, it must be once, but when we know not. IV. The natural fears and terrors of death, or our natural aversion to it, and how they may be allayed and sweetened.

CHAP. I.

The several notions of death, and the improvement of them.

I. WHAT death is ; and I shall consider three things in it : 1. That it is our leaving this world. 2. Our putting off these earthly bodies. 3. Our entrance into a new and unknown state of life ; for when we die, we do not fall into nothing, or into a profound sleep, into a state of silence and insensibility till the resurrection ; but we only change our place, and our dwelling ; we remove out of this world, and leave our bodies to sleep in the earth till the resurrection, but our souls and spirits live still in an invisible state. I shall not go about to prove these things, but take it for granted, that you all believe them ; for that we leave this world, and that our bodies rot and putrify in the grave, needs no proof, for we see it with our eyes ; and that our souls cannot die, but are by nature immortal, has been the belief of all mankind ; the Gods, which the heathens worshiped, were most of them no other but dead men, and therefore they did believe, that the soul survived the funeral of the body, or they could never have made Gods of them : nay, there is such a strong sense of immortality imprinted on our natures, that very few men, how much soever they have debauched their natural sentiments, can wholly deliver themselves from the fears of another world. But we have a more sure word of prophecy than this ; since life and immortality is now brought to light by the gospel. For this is so plainly taught in scripture, that no man, who believes that, needs any other proof. My business therefore shall only be to shew you, how such thoughts as these should affect our minds : what that wisdom is, which the thoughts of death will naturally teach us ; how that man ought to live, who knows, that he must die, and leave his body behind him to rot in the grave, and go himself into a new world of spirits.

SECT. I. The first notion of death, that it is our leaving this world, with the improvement of it.

I. FIRST, then, let us consider death only as our leaving this world : a very delightful place you will say, especially when our circumstances are easy and prosperous ; here a man finds whatever he most naturally loves, whatever he takes pleasure in ; the supply of all his wants, the gratification of all his senses, whatever an earthly creature can wish for or desire : The truth is, few men know any other happiness, much less any thing above it ; they feel what strikes upon their senses ; this they think a real and substantial good, but as for more pure and intellectual joys, they know no more what to make of them, than of ghosts and spirits ; they account them thin vanishing things, and wonder what men mean who talk so much of them : Nay, good men themselves are apt to be too much pleased with this world, while they are easy here ; something else is necessary to wean them from it, and to cure their fondness of it, besides the thoughts of dying, which makes the sufferings and afflictions and disappointments of this life, so necessary for the best of men. This is one thing which makes the thoughts of death so terrible ; men think themselves very well as they are, and most men think that they cannot be better, and therefore very few are desirous of a change : extreme miseries may conquer the love of life, and some few divine souls may long with St. Paul to be dissolved and to be with Christ, which is best of all, but this world is a beloved place to the generality of mankind, and that makes it a very troublesome thing to leave it : whereas did we rightly consider this matter, it would rectify our mistakes about things, and teach us how to value, and how to use them. For,

1st, If we must leave this world, how valuable soever these things are in themselves, they are not so valuable to us. For besides the intrinsic worth of things, there is something more required to engage the affections of wise men, viz. propriety and a secure enjoyment. What is not our own, we may admire if it be excellent, but cannot dote on ; and what is worth having, increases or decreases in value proportionably to the length and certainty of its continuance ; what we cannot enjoy is nothing to us, how excellent soever it be, and to enjoy it but a little while, is next to not enjoying it, for we cannot enjoy it always ; and such things cannot be called our own, and this shews us, what value we ought to set upon this world, and all things in it ; even just so much as upon things that are not our own, and which we cannot keep.

We use indeed to call things our own, which we have a legal title to, which no man can by law or justice deprive us of, and this is the only property we can have in these things, a property against all other human claims ; but nothing which can be taken from us, nothing which we must leave, is properly our own ; for in a strict sense nothing is our own but what is essential, either to our being, or to our happiness. Creatures are proprietors of nothing, not so much as of themselves, for we are his who made us, and who may unmake us again when he pleases ; but yet there are some things proper to our natures, and that is all the natural property we have ; but what is thus proper to us we cannot be deprived of without ceasing to be, or being miserable.

And this proves that the things of this world are not our own, that they are not proper and peculiar to our natures, though they are necessary to this present state of life : While we live here we want them, but when we leave this world, we must live without them, and may be happy without them too. There is a great agreeableness between the things of this world and an earthly nature, they are a great support and comfort to us in this mortal state ; and therefore while we live in this world we may value the enjoyments of it, for the ease and conveniencies of life : but we must neither call this life nor any enjoyments of it our own, because they are short and perishing ; we are here but as travellers in an inn, it is not our home and country, it is not our portion and inheritance, but a moveable and changeable scene, which is entertaining at present, but cannot last. Let us then consider, how we ought to value such things as these, and to make it as plain and self evident as I can, I shall put some easy and familiar cases.

1. Suppose you were travelling through a very delightful country, where you met with all the pleasures and conveniences of life, but knew that you must not tarry there, but only pass through it ; would you think it reasonable to set your affections so much upon it, as to make it uneasy to you to leave it ? And shall we then grow so fond of this world which we must only pass through, where we have no abiding city, as to enslave ourselves to the lusts and pleasures of it, and to carry out of this world such a passion for it, as shall make us miserable in the next : For though death will separate us from this world, we are not sure that it will cure our earthly passions ; we may still find the torment of sensual appetites, when all sensual objects are removed : This was all the purgatory-fire St. Augustin could think of, that those who loved this world too much here, though otherwise innocent and virtuous men, should be punished with fruitless desires and hankerings after this world in the next ; which is a mixt torment of desire and despair. For though indeed it is only living in these bodies, which betrays the soul to such earthly affections, yet when the impression is once made, and is strong and vigorous, we are not sure that merely putting off these bodies will cure it ; as we see age itself in old sinners does not cure the wantonness of desire, when the body is effete and languid ; and this I should think were reason enough to convince every man, who considers, that he is not to live here always, how much it concerns him not to grow over fond of present things ; for to contract an eternal passion for what we cannot always enjoy, must needs make us miserable.

2. If then we must not entertain a fondness for those things, which we cannot keep, let us in the next place consider, how we must use those things, which we have but a present and momentary possession of ; for use is apt to beget a fondness. Suppose then again, that in your travels abroad, you pass through such a delightful country, what is it that prevents your fondness, but only considering, that you are not at home, that you must not always see and enjoy what you now do ; and therefore all the fine things you meet with, you rather look upon as curiosities to be remarked in story or to be tried by way of experiment, or to be used for present necessity, than as things which are to be enjoyed, for you know they are not : and did we use the world thus, we should never grow over fond of it. Those who marry would be as though they married not, and those who weep, as though they wept not ; and those who rejoice, as though they rejoiced not, and those who use this world, as not abusing it, because the fashion of this world passeth away. The world itself will not last long, though it will out-last us, but we are to continue here so little a while, that we have no reason to call it our home, or to place our enjoyment in it : It is an old and a good distinction, that some things are only for use, and some things for enjoyment. The first we value only for their use, the second we account our happiness. Now it is certain, that what is transient and momentary can be only for use, for man is a miserable creature, if what is his happiness, be not lasting : and a very foolish creature, if he places his happiness in what is not lasting. Now this should make a vast difference in our affections to things. We cannot blame any man who lets loose his affections upon that which is his happiness ; for there neither can nor ought to be any bounds set to our desires or enjoyment of true happiness ; but what we account only for use, we have no farther concernment for, but only as it is of use to us ; and this confines our desires and affections to its use ; and were this the measure of our love to present things, as it ought to be, we could not err, nor entertain any troublesome or vicious passion from them. As for instance : What is the natural use of eating and drinking, but to repair the decays of nature, and preserve our bodies in health and vigor ? Now as great delicacies and curiosities, as there are in nature, both of food and liquors, if men valued them only for their use, they would never be guilty of excess ; nor grow so fond of them, as if they were made only to eat and drink, and to judge of the differences of tastes. To value things for their use, is to value them no farther than they are useful ; and this is the only value which is due to things which we must leave ; for they can be only for present use : but when we come to place our happiness, as all sensual men do, in things which are designed only for our use, it both makes us extravagant in the use of them, (which often proves a great mischief to us in this world,) and creates such an unnatural passion for them, as they cannot answer, which makes them vain, and empty, and unsatisfactory while we have them, and fills us with vexation, and all the restlessness of a furious passion and appetite when we want them ; as we must do at one time or other, either before, or to be sure when we leave this world.

3. Let us suppose again, that in our passage through foreign countries, where we are not to stay long, we should not meet with all those necessities and conveniences of life, which we have at home ; that the country is barren; the way rough and mountainous, the road infested with thieves and robbers, but without any convenient reception for travellers, the people rude and barbarous, and insolent to strangers ; will a wise man be over solicitous about such hardships as these in travelling ? Does he not comfort himself, that he is not to stay there, that this will not last long ; that these difficulties will only recommend his own country to him, and make him hasten home again, where he shall remember with pleasure, what is now uneasy and troublesome ?

And is there not as much reason for christians to bear all the evils and casualties and sufferings of this life with an equal mind, remembering that they are not to stay always here ? that this life is but their pilgrimage, they are from home, and therefore must expect the usage which strangers and travellers ordinarily meet with ; that they are not to live here always, is a sufficient proof, that their happiness does not consist in present things ; and then if they can make a shift, though it may be it is a hard shift, to pass through this world, the scene will be altered, and they shall find a kinder reception in the next. This is the foundation of contentment in all conditions, and of patience under sufferings ; that death, which is not far off, when it removes us out of this world, will remove us from all the sufferings of it : And why should we not bear up with the courage and resolution of travellers in the mean time, when we have a home, a peaceful and eternal home, in our prospect :

4. Once more, to conclude this argument : Suppose a man in his travels through a foreign country, should be commanded immediately to leave the country, unless he would forswear ever returning to his own country again ; would not a wise man consider, that if he had not been commanded to leave that country, he did not intend to have staid long in it ; and therefore it would be an unaccountable folly and madness in him to abjure his own country, where his father, and kindred, and inheritance is, only to gratify his curiosity in staying a little longer there. And can we then think it a hard command, (when we know we must shortly die, and leave this world, that whether we will or no, we cannot stay long in it) to sacrifice our very lives, rather than renounce our hopes of heaven and a better life : when we know that we must leave this world, what does it signify to die a little sooner, than it may be in the course of nature we should, to obtain an immortal life ? To go to that blessed Jesus, who lived in this world for us, and died for us, and is ready to receive us into that blessed place where he is, that we may behold his glory. I am sure it is a very foolish thing for a man, who must die, to forfeit an immortal life, to reprieve a mortal and perishing life for some few years.

II. As death, which is our leaving this world, proves that these present things are not very valuable to us, so it proves, that they are not the most valuable things in their own natures ; though we were to enjoy them always, it would be but a very mean and imperfect state, in comparison of that better life, which is reserved for good men in the next world. For, 1. It is congruous to the divine wisdom and goodness, that the best things should be the most lasting : wisdom dictates this ; for it is no more than to give the preference to those things which are best : The longest continuance gives a natural preference to things ; we always value those things most which we shall enjoy longest ; and therefore to give the longest duration to the worst things, is to set the greatest value on them, and to teach mankind, to prefer them before that which is better. What we value most, we desire to enjoy longest, and were it in our power, we would make such things the most lasting ; which shews, that it is the natural sense of mankind, that the best things deserve to continue longest ; and therefore we need not doubt, but that infinite wisdom, which made the world, has proportioned the continuance of things to their true worth. And if God have made the best things the most lasting, then the next world in its own intrinsic nature is as much better than this world, as it will last longer. For this is most agreeable to the divine goodness too, and God's love to his creatures, that what is their greatest and truest happiness should be most lasting. For if God have made man capable of different degrees and states of happiness, of living in this world and in the next, it is an expression of more perfect goodness (as it is most for the happiness of his creatures) that the most perfect state of happiness should last the longest ; for the more perfectly happy we are, the more do we experience the divine goodness, and he is the most perfectly happy, who has the longest enjoyment of the best things.

2. It seems most agreeable also to the divine wisdom and goodness, that where God makes such a vast change in the state of his creatures, as to remove them from this world to the next, the last state should be the most perfect and happy. I speak now of such creatures as God designs for happiness, for the reason alters where he intends to punish : But where God intends to do good to creatures, it seems a very improper method to translate them from a more perfect and happy to a less happy state. Every abatement of happiness is a degree of punishment, and that which those men are very sensible of, who have enjoyed a more perfect happiness : and therefore we may certainly conclude, that God would not remove good men out of this world, were this the happiest place.

Yes, you will say, death is the punishment of sin, and therefore it is a punishment to be removed out of this world, which spoils that argument, that this world is not the happiest place, because God removes good men out of it : for this is the effect of that curse, which was entailed on mankind for the sin of Adam, dust thou art, and to dust thou shalt return.

Now I grant, death, as it signifies a separation of soul and body, and the death of both, which was included in that curse, was a curse, and a punishment, but not as it signifies leaving this world, and living in the next.

We have some reason to think, that though man should never have died, if he had not sinned, yet he should not always have lived in this world. Human nature was certainly made for greater things than the enjoyments of sense : it is capable of nobler advancements ; it is related to heaven, and to the world of spirits ; and therefore it seems more likely, that had man continued innocent, and by the constant exercise of wisdom and virtue improved his faculties, and raised himself above his body, and grown up into the divine nature and life, after a long and happy life here, he should have been translated into heaven, as Enoch and Elias were without dying. For had all men continued innocent, and lived to this day, and propagated their kind, this little spot of earth had many ages since been over peopled, and could not have subsisted without transplanting some colonies of the most divine and purified souls into the other world.

But however that be, it is certain, that being removed out of this world, and living in heaven is not the curse : this fallen man had no right to ; for he, who by sin had forfeited an earthly paradise, could not thereby gain a title to Heaven. Eternal life is the gift of God through Jesus Christ our Lord : it is the reward of good men, of a well spent life in this world, of our faith and patience in doing and suffering the will of God ; it is our last and final state, where we shall live forever, and therefore the argument is still good, that this world cannot be the happiest place ; for then heaven could not be a reward. Though all men are under the necessity of dying, yet if this world had been the happiest place, God would have raised good men to have lived again in this world ; which he could as easily have done, as have translated them to heaven.

Now if this world be not the happiest place, if present things be not the most valuable, as appears from this very consideration, that we must leave this world, (for to this I must confine my discourse at present) there are several very good uses to be made of this : as, I. To rectify our notions about present things. II. To live in expectation of some better things. III. Not to be over concerned about the shortness of our lives here.

1. To rectify our notions about present things : 'tis our opinions of things which ruin us : for what mankind account their greatest happiness, they must love, and they must love without bounds or measure : and it would go a great way to cure our extravagant fondness and passion for these things, could we persuade ourselves that there is any thing better. But this, I confess, is a very hard thing for most men to do, because present things have much the advantage of what is absent and future. Some who believe another life after this, whatever great things they may talk of the other world, yet do not seem thoroughly persuaded, that the next world is a happier state than this ; for I think they could not be so fond of this world, if they were : and the reason of it is plain, because happiness cannot be so well known, as by feeling ; now men feel the pleasures and happiness of this world, but do not feel the happiness of the next, and therefore are apt to think, that this is the greatest happiness, which does most sensibly affect them : But would they but seriously consider things, they might see reason to think otherwise, that the unknown joys and pleasures of the other world are much greater than any pleasures, which they feel here. For let us thus reason with ourselves : I find I am mortal, and must shortly leave this world ; and yet I believe, that my soul cannot die, as my body does, but shall only be translated to another state : whatever I take pleasure in, in this world, I must leave behind me, and know not what I shall find in the next : but surely the other world, where I must live forever, is not worse furnished than this world, which I must so quickly leave : for has God made me immortal and provided no sorts of pleasures and entertainments for an immortal state, when he has so liberally furnished the short and changeable scene of this life ? I know not indeed what the pleasures of the next world are ; but no more did I know, what the pleasures of this world were, till I came into it ; and therefore that is no argument that there are no pleasures there, because I do not yet know them ; and if there be any pleasures there, surely they must be greater than what are here, because it is a more lasting state : for can we think, that God has emptied all his stores and treasures into this world ? nay, 'can we think, that he has given us the best things first, where we can only just taste them, and leave them behind us ? which is to excite and provoke an appetite, which shall be restless and uneasy to eternity. No, surely ! the other world must be infinitely a more happy place than this, because it will last infinitely longer : the divine wisdom and goodness has certainly reserved the best things for eternity ; for as eternal beings are the most perfect, so they must be the most happy too, unless we can separate perfection and happiness : and therefore I cannot but conclude, that there are greater pleasures, that there is a happier state of life than this, because there is a life which lasts forever.

2. This will naturally teach us to live in expectation of better things, of greater, though unknown and unexperienced pleasures, which methinks all men should do, who know, that there are better things to be had ; and that they must go into that state, where these better things are to be had : for can any man be contented with a less degree of happiness, who knows there is a greater ? This is stupidity and baseness of spirit ? an ignoble mind, which is not capable of great hopes : ambition and covetousness indeed are ill names, but yet they are symptoms of a great and generous soul, and are excellent virtues, when directed to their right objects, that is, to such objects as are truly great and excellent, for it is only the meanness of the object, which makes them vices : to be ambitious of true honor, of the true glory and perfection of our natures, is the very principle and incentive of virtue ; but to be ambitious of titles ; of place, of some ceremonious respects, and civil pageantry, is as vain and little as the things are which they court. To be covetous of true and real happiness, to set no bounds nor measures to our desires or pursuit of it, is true greatness of mind, which will take up with nothing on this side perfection ; for God and nature have set no bounds to our desires of happiness ; but as it is in natural, so it ought to be in moral agents, every thing grows till it comes to its maturity and perfection ; but then covetousness is a vice, when men mistake their object, and are insatiable in their desires of that which is not their happiness ; as gold and silver, houses and lands ; what is more than we want, and more than we can use, cannot be the happiness of a man. And thus it is on the other hand , though humility be a great virtue, as it is opposed to earthly ambitions, as it sets us above the little opinions and courtship of the world, which are such mean things, as argue meanness of spirit to stoop to them ; yet it is not humility, but sordidness, to be regardless of true honor : thus to be contented with our external fortune in this world, what ever it be ; to be able to see the greater prosperity and splendor of other men, without envy, and without repining at our own meanness, is a great virtue ; because these things are not our happiness, but for the use and conveniences of this present life, and to be contented with a little of them for present use, is an argument, that we do not think them our happiness, which is the true excellency of this virtue of contentment ; but to be contented, if we may so call it, to want that which is our true happiness, or any degree or portion of it, to be contented never to enjoy the greatest and best things, is a vice which contradicts the natural desires of happiness ; and you may call it what you will, if you can think of any name bad enough for it. It is the most despicable temper in the world, to have no sense of true honor or happiness, or when we know there are greater and better things, to take up with some low enjoyments. And therefore let the thoughts of this enable our minds, and since there are better things in the other world, let us use our utmost endeavors to possess ourselves of them ; let us live like men, who are born for greater things than this world affords ; let us endeavor to inform ourselves, what the happiness of the next world is, and how we may attain it ; and let us use all present things, as those who know there are infinitely greater and better things reserved for us in the next world.

III. This should teach us also, not be over concerned for the shortness of our lives : our lives indeed are very short, they fly away like a shadow, and fade like the flowers of the field ; and this were a very unsupportable thought, were there either no life after this, or not so happy a life as this. But besides all the other proofs we have of another life, the very shortness of our lives may convince us, that death does not put an end to our being : for can we imagine, that so noble a creature as man is, was made for a day ? man, I say, who is big with such immortal designs, full of projects for future ages, who can look backward and forward, and see an eternity without beginning and without end : who was made to contemplate the wonders of nature and providence, and to admire and adore his maker ; who is the Lord of this lower world, but has eyes to look up to heaven, and view all the glories of it, and to pry into that invisible world, which this veil of flesh intercepts the sight of : man, who is so long a child, and by such slow steps arrives to the use of reason, and by that time he has got a little knowledge, and is earnestly seeking after more ; by that time he knows, what it is to be a man, and to what purpose he ought to live, what God is ; and how much he is bound to love and worship him ; while he is enobling his soul with all heavenly qualities and virtues, and copying out the divine image ; when the glories of human nature begin to appear, and to shine in him ; that is, when he is most fit to live, to serve God and men ; then I say, either this mortal nature decays, and dust returns to its dust again, or some violent distemper or evil accident cuts him off in a vigorous age, and when with great labor and industry he is become fit to live, he must live no longer. How is it possible to reconcile this with the wisdom of God, if man perishes when he dies ; if he ceases to be, as soon as he comes to be a man ? And therefore we have reason to believe, that death only translates us into another world, where the beginnings of wisdom and virtue here, grow up into perfection ; and if that be a more happy place, than this world, as you have already heard, we have no reason to quarrel, that we live so little a while here : for setting aside the miseries and calamities, the troubles and inconveniences of this life, which the happiest men are exposed to, (for our experience tells us, that there is no complete and unmixed happiness here) setting aside, that this world is little else than a scene of misery to a great part of mankind, who struggle with want and poverty, labor under the oppressions of men, or the pains and sicknesses of diseased bodies ; yet if we were as happy as this world could make us, we should have no reason to complain, that we must exchange it for a much greater happiness. We now call it death to leave this world ; but were we once out of it, and enstated in the happiness of the next, we should think it were dying indeed to come into it again. We read of none of the apostles, who did so passionately desire to be dissolved, and to be with Christ, as St. Paul ; and there was some reason for it, because he had had a taste of that happiness, being snatched up into the third heavens. Indeed could we see the glories of that place, it would make us impatient of living here, and possibly that is one reason, why they are concealed from us ; but yet reason tells us, that if death translated us to a better place, the shortness of our lives here is an advantage to us, if we take care to spend them well, for we shall be the sooner possessors of a much happier life.

III. From this notion of death, that it is our leaving this world, I observe farther, what this life is, only a state of growth and improvement, of trial and probation for the next : there can be no doubt of this, if we consider what the scripture tells us of it, that we shall be rewarded in the next world, as we have behaved ourselves in this : that we shall receive according to what we have done in the body, whether good or evil ; which proves, that this life is only in order to the next ; that our eternal happiness or misery shall bear proportion to the good or evil which we have done here. And when we only consider, that after a short continuance here, man must be removed out of this world, if we believe, that he does not utterly perish when he dies, but subsists still in another state, we have reason to believe, that this life is only a preparation for the next : for why should a man come into this world, and afterwards be removed into another, if this world had no relation nor subordination to the next ? Indeed it is evident that man is an improveable creature, not created at first in the utmost perfection of his nature, nor put into the happiest state he is capable of, but trained up to perfection and happiness by degrees : Adam himself in a state of innocence, was but upon his good behavior, but a probationer for immortality, which he forfeited by his sin : and as I observed before, it is most probable, that had he continued innocent, and refined and exalted his nature by the practice of divine virtues, he should not have lived always in this world, but have been translated into heaven : and I cannot see, how it is inconsistent with the wisdom of God, to make some creatures in a state of probation ; that as the angelical nature was created so pure at first, as to be fit to live in heaven ; so man, though an earthly, yet a reasonable creature, might be in a capacity, by the improvement of his natural powers, of advancing himself thither : as it became the manifold wisdom of God to create the earth as well as the heavens, so it became his wisdom to make man to inhabit this earth ; for it was not fitting, that any part of the world should be destitute of reasonable beings, to know and adore their maker, and to ascribe to him the glory of his works : but then, since a reasonable nature is capable of greater improvements than to live always in this world, it became the divine goodness to make this world only a state of probation and dicipline for the next, that those who by a long and constant practice of virtue had spiritualized their natures into a divine purity, might ascend into heaven, which is the true center of all intelligent beings. This seems to be the original intention of God in making man, and then this earthly life was from the beginning but a state of growth and improvement to make us fit for heaven, though without dying.

But to be sure the scene is much altered now, for Adam by his sin made himself mortal, and corrupted his own nature, and propagated a mortal and corrupt nature to his posterity ; and therefore we have no natural right to immortality, nor can we refine our souls into such a divine purity as is fit for heaven, by the weakened and corrupted powers of nature ; but what we cannot do, Christ has done for us : he has purchased immortality for us by his death, and quickens and raises us into a new life by his spirit ; but since still we must die, before we are immortal, it is more plain than ever, that this life is only in order to the next, that the great business we have to do in this world, is to prepare ourselves for immortality and glory.

Now if our life in this world be only in order to another life, we ought not to expect our complete happiness here, for we are only in the way to it ; we must finish the work God has given us to do in this world, and expect our reward in the next ; and if our reward cannot be had in this world, we may conclude that there is something much better in the next world than any thing here.

If this life be our time to work in, we should not consult our ease, and softness, and pleasures here ; for this is a place of labor and diligence, not of rest : we are traveling to heaven, and must have our eye on our journey's end, and not hunt after pleasures and diversions in the way.

The great end of living in this world, is to be happy in the next, and therefore we must wisely improve present things, that they may turn to our future account : must make to ourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, that when we fail, they may receive us, into everlasting habitations. What concerns a better life must take up most of our thoughts and care, and whatever endangers our future happiness, must be rejected with all its charms. It would not be worth the while to live some few years here, were we not to live for ever ; and therefore it becomes a wise man, who remembers, that he must shortly leave this world to make this present life wholly subservient to his future happiness.

SECT. II. The second notion of death, that it is our putting off these bodies.

II. LET us now consider death as it is our putting off these bodies ; for this is the proper notion of death, the separation of soul and body, that the body returns to dust, the soul or spirit unto God, who gave it : when we die, we do not cease to be, nor cease to live, but only cease to live in these earthly bodies ; the vital union between soul and body is dissolved, we are no longer encloistered in a tabernacle of flesh, we no longer feel the impressions of it, neither the pains nor pleasures of the body can affect us, it can charm, it can tempt no longer. This needs no proof, but very well deserves our most serious meditations.

For, 1. This teaches us the difference and distinction between soul and body, which men, who are sunk into flesh and sense, are so apt to forget ; nay, to loose the very notion and belief of it : all their delights are fleshy, they know no other pleasures, but what their five senses furnish them with ; they cannot raise their thoughts above this body, nor entertain any noble designs, and therefore they imagine, that they are nothing but flesh and blood, a little organized and animated clay ; and it is no great wonder, that men who feel the workings and motions of no higher principle of life in them, but flesh and sense, should imagine that they are nothing but flesh themselves : though methinks when we see the senseless and putrefying remains of a brave man before us, it is hard to conceive, that this is all of him ; that this is the thing which some few hours ago could reason and discourse, was fit to govern a kingdom, or to instruct mankind, could despise flesh and sense, and govern all his bodily appetites and inclinations, was adorned with all divine graces and virtues, was the glory and pride of the age : and is this dead carcase, which we now see, the whole of him ? or was there a more divine inhabitant, which animated this earthly machine, which gave life, and beauty, and motion to it, but is now removed ?

To be sure, those who believe that death does not put an end to their being, but only removes them out of this body, which rots in the grave, while their souls survive, live and act, and may be happy in a separate state, should carefully consider this distinction between soul and body, which would teach them a most divine and heavenly wisdom.

For when we consider, that we consist of soul and body, which are the two distinct parts of man, this will teach us to take care of both : for can any man who believes he has a soul, be concerned only for his body ? A compound creature cannot be happy, unless both parts of him enjoy their proper pleasures. He who enjoys only the pleasures of the body, is never the happier for having a human and reasonable soul ; the soul of a beast would have done as well, and it may be better ; for brute creatures relish bodily pleasures as much, and it may be more, than men do, and reason is very troublesome to those men, who resolve to live like brutes ; for it makes them ashamed and afraid, which in many cases hinders, or at least allays their pleasures : and why should not a man desire the full and entire happiness of a man ? Why should he despise any part of himself, and that, as you shall hear presently, the best part too ? And therefore at least we ought to take as much care of our souls as of our bodies : do we adorn our bodies that we may be fit to be seen, and to converse with men, and may receive those respects which are due to our quality and fortune ; and shall we not adorn our souls too, with those christian graces which make us lovely in the sight of God and men ? The ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price ; which St. Peter especially recommends to christian women as a more valuable ornament than the outward adorning of plaiting the hair, or wearing gold, or putting on of apparel, 1 Pet. 3. iii. 4. The ornaments of wisdom and prudence, of well governed passions, of goodness and charity, which give a grace and beauty to all our actions, and such a pleasing and charming air to our very countenance, as the most natural beauty, or artificial washes and paints can never imitate.

Are we careful to preserve our bodies from any hurt, from pain and sickness, from burning fevers, or the racking gout or stone, and shall we not be as careful of the ease of the mind too ? To quiet and calm those passions which when they grow outrageous, are more intolerable than all natural or artificial tortures ; to moderate those desires, which rage like hunger and thirst ; those fears which convulse the mind with trembling and paralytic motions ; those furious tempests of anger, revenge, and envy, which ruffle our minds, and fill us with vexation, restlessness and confusion of thoughts ; especially those guilty reflections upon ourselves, that worm in the conscience which gnaws the soul, and torments us with shame and remorse, and dreadful expectations of an avenger : these are the sickness and distempers of the soul : these are pains indeed, more sharp and pungent and killing pains than our bodies are capable of : The spirit of man can bear his infirmity, natural courage, or the powers of reason, or the comforts of religion, can support us under all other sufferings, but a wounded spirit who can bear ? And therefore a man, who loves ease, should in the first place take care of the ease of his mind, for that will make all other sufferings easy ; but nothing can support a man whose mind is wounded.

Are we fond of bodily pleasures ? are we ready to purchase them at any rate ? And if we be men, why should we despise the pleasures of the mind ? if we have souls, why should we not reap the benefit and pleasures of them ? do you think there are no pleasures proper to the soul ? have we souls that are good for nothing ? of no use to us, but only to relish the pleasures of the body ? Ask those who have tried, what the pleasures of wisdom and knowledge are, which do as much excel the pleasures of seeing, as truth is more beautiful and glorious than the sun : ask them what a pleasure it is to know God, the greatest and best being, and the brightest object of our minds, to contemplate his wisdom, and goodness, and power in the works of creation and providence ; to be swallowed up in that stupendous mystery of love, the redemption of sinners by the incarnation and sufferings of the son of God: ask them, what the pleasures of innocence and virtue are; what the feast of a good conscience means; which is the greatest happiness, to give or to receive; what the joys even of sufferings and persecutions, of want and poverty and reproach are for the sake of Christ. Ask a devout soul, what transports and ravishments of spirit he feels, when he is upon his knees, when with St. Paul he is even snatched up into the third heavens, filled with God, overflowing with praises and divine joys: and does it not then become a man, who has a reasonable soul, to seek after these rational, these manly, these divine pleasures, the pleasures of the mind and spirit, which are proper and peculiar to a reasonable creature? Let him do this, and then let him enjoy the pleasures of the body as much as he can, which will be very insipid and tasteless, when his soul is ravished with more noble delights.

In a word, if we are so careful to preserve the life of our bodies, which we know must die, and rot and putrefy in the grave, methinks we should not be less careful to preserve the life of our soul, which is the only immortal part of us: for though our souls cannot die, as our bodies do, yet they may be miserable, and that is called eternal death, where the worm never dieth, and the fire never goeth out: for to be always miserable, is infinitely worse than not to be at all, and therefore is the most formidable death. And if we are so unwilling to part with these mortal bodies, we ought in reason to be much more afraid to lose our souls.

II. That death is our putting off these bodies teaches us, that the soul is the only principle of life and sensation : the body cannot live without the soul, but as soon as it is parted from it, it loses all sense and motion, and returns to its original dust ; but the soul can and does live without the body, and therefore there is the principle of life. This may be thought a very common and obvious observation, and indeed so it is ; but the consequences of this are not so commonly observed, and yet are of great use and moment.

For, 1. This shews us, that the soul is the best part of us, that the soul indeed is the man, because it is the only seat of life and knowledge, and sensations ; for a man is a living, reasonable, and understanding being, and therefore a living reasonable soul (not an earthly body, which has no life nor sense, but what it derives from the soul) must be the man : Hence in scripture, soul so frequently signifies the man ; thus we read of the souls that were born to Jacob, and the souls that came with him into Egypt, Gen. xvi. that is, his sons : and soul signifies ourselves, a friend which is as thy own soul ; that is, as dear to us as ourselves, Deut. xiii. 6. and Jonathan loved David as his own soul ; that is, as himself, 1 Sam. xviii. 3. For in propriety of speech, the body has no sense at all, but the soul lives in the body, and feels all the motions and impressions of it : so that it is the soul only that is capable of happiness or misery, of pain or pleasure ; and therefore it is the only concern of a wise man to take care of his soul ; as our Saviour tells us, What shall it profit a man, though he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul, or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul ? Matth. xvi. 26. The reason of which is easily apprehended, when we remember, that the soul only is capable of happiness or misery ; that it is the soul which must enjoy every thing else : and what can the whole world then signify to him who has no soul to enjoy it ; whose soul is condemned to endless and eternal miseries ? Such a miserable soul is as incapable of enjoying the world, or any thing in it, as if it had lost its being.

2ly. Hence we learn the true notion of bodily pleasures, that they are such pleasures as the soul feels by its union to the body ; for it is not the body that feels the pleasures, but the soul, though the body be the instrument of them : and therefore how fond soever we are of them, we may certainly conclude, that bodily pleasures are the meanest pleasures of human nature ; because the union to these earthly bodies is the meanest and most despicable state of reasonable souls. These are not its proper and genuine pleasures, (which must result from its own nature and powers) but are only external impressions, the light and superficial touches of matter ; and it would be very absurd to conceive, that the soul, which is the only subject of pleasure, should have no pleasures of its own, but borrow its whole happiness from its affinity and alliance to matter ; or that its greatest pleasures should be owing to external impressions, not to the actings of its own natural faculties and powers : which may convince us, as I observed before, that the pleasures of the mind are much the greatest and noblest pleasures of the man ; and he who would be truly happy, must seek for it not in bodily entertainments, but in the improvements and exercise of reason and religion.

Sly, Hence we learn also, that the body was made for the soul, not the soul for the body ; as that which in itself has no life and sense, is made for the use of that which has : the body is only a convenient habitation for the soul in this world, an instrument of action, and a trial and exercise of virtue ; but the soul is to use the body and to govern it, to taste its pleasures, and to set bounds to them, to make the body serviceable to the ends and purposes of reason and virtue, not to subject reason to passion and sense : if the body was made for the use of the soul, it was never intended the soul should wholly conform itself to it, and by its sympathy with corporeal passions, transform itself into a sensual and brutish nature. Such degenerate creatures are those who live only to serve the body, who value nothing else, and seek for nothing else, but how to gratify their appetites and lusts, which is to invert the order of nature, to fall in love with our slaves, and change fortunes and shackles with them. That our Savior might well say, He that committeth sin, is the servant of sin : for this is a vile and unnatural subjection to serve the body, which was made to serve the soul ; such men shall receive the reward of slaves, to be turned out of God's family, and not to inherit with sons and freemen, as our Savior adds, The servant abideth not in the house forever, but the son abideth forever ; if the son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed, John viii. 31, 32.

III. That death, which is our leaving this world, is nothing else but our putting off these bodies, teaches us, that it is only our union to these bodies, which intercepts the sight of the other world : the other world is not at such a distance from us, as we may imagine ; the throne of God indeed is at a great remove from this earth, above the third heavens, where he displays his glory to those blessed spirits which encompass his throne ; but as soon as we step out of these bodies, we step into the other world, which is not so properly another world, (for there is the same heaven and earth still) as a new state of life. To live in these bodies is to live in this world, to live out of them, is to remove into the next : for while our souls are confined to these bodies, and can look only through these material casements, nothing but what is material can affect us, nay, nothing but what is so gross, that it can reflect light, and convey the shapes and colors of things with it to the eye : so that though within this visible world, there be a more glorious scene of things, than what appears to us, we perceive nothing at all of it : for this veil of flesh parts the visible and invisible world : but when we put off these bodies, there are new and surprising wonders present themselves to our view ; when these material spectacles are taken off, the soul with its own naked eyes, sees what was invisible before : and then we are in the other world, when we can see it, and converse with it. Thus St. Paul tells us, that when we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord ; but when we are absent from the body, we are present with the Lord. 2 Cor. v. 6, 8. And methinks this is enough to cure us of our fondness for these bodies, unless we think it more desirable to be confined to a prison, and to look through a grate all our lives, which gives us but a very narrow prospect, and that none of the best neither, than to be set at liberty to view all the glories of the world : what would we give now for the least glimpse of that invisible world, which the first step we take out of these bodies, will present us with ? There are such things as eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive. Death opens our eyes, enlarges our prospect, presents us with a new and more glorious world, which we can never see, while we are shut up in flesh, which should make us as willing to part with this veil, as to take the film off our eyes, which hinders our sight.

IV. If we must put off our bodies, methinks we should not much glory nor pride ourselves in them, nor spend too much of our time about them : for why should that be our pride, why should that be our business, which we must shortly part with ? And yet as for pride, these mortal corruptible bodies, and what relates to them, administer most of the occasions of it.

Some men glory in their birth, and in their descent from noble ancestors, and ancient families ; which, besides the vanity of it, for if we trace our pedigrees to their original, it is certain that all our families are equally ancient, and equally noble, for we descend all from Adam ; and in such a long descent as this, no man can tell, whether there have not been beggars and princes in those which are the noblest and meanest families now : yet, I say, what is all this, but to pride ourselves in our bodies, and our bodily descent, unless men think that their souls are derived from their parents too. Indeed our birth is so very ignoble, whatever our ancestors are, or however it may be dissembled with some pompous circumstances, that no man has any reason to glory in it ; for the greatest prince is born like the wild ass' colt. Others glory in their external beauty ; which how great and charming soever it be, is but the beauty of the body, which if it be spared by sickness and old age, must perish in the grave : death will spoil those features and colors which are now admired, and after a short time, there will be no distinction between this beautiful body, and common dust. Others are guilty of greater vanity than this, and what nature has denied, they supply by art ; they adorn their bodies with rich attire, and many times such bodies as will not be adorned, and then they glory in their borrowed feathers : but what a sorry beauty is that, which they cannot carry into the other world ? And if they must leave their bodies in the grave, I think there will be no great occasion in the other world for their rich and splendid apparel, which will not fit a soul.

Thus what do riches signify, but to minister to the wants and conveniences and pleasures of the body ? And therefore to pride ourselves in riches, is to glory in the body too ; to think ourselves more considerable than other men, because we can provide better for our bodies than they can. And what a mean and contemptible vice is pride, whose subject and occasion is so mean and contemptible ? To pride ourselves in these bodies which have so ignoble an extraction, are of so short a continuance, will have so ignoble an end, and must lie down in the grave, and be food for worms.

As for the care of our bodies ; that must unavoidably take up a great part of our time, to supply the necessities of nature, and to provide the conveniences of life ; but this may be for the good of our souls too, as honest labor and industry, and ingenious arts are ; but for men to spend their whole time in sloth and luxury, in eating and drinking and sleeping, in dressing and adorning their bodies, or gratifying their lusts, this is to be vile slaves and servants to the body, to bodies which neither need nor deserve this from us : after all our care, they will tumble into dust, and commonly much the sooner for our indulgence of them.

V. If death be our putting off these bodies, then it is certain that we must live without these bodies, till the resurrection ; nay, that we must always live without such bodies as these are : for though our bodies shall rise again yet they shall be changed and transformed into a spiritual nature ; as St. Paul expressly tells us, 1 Cor. xv. 42, 43, 44. It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption ; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory ; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power ; it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body : For as he adds, 50 v. Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, neither can corruption inherit incorruption. Which is true of a fleshly soul, but here is understood of a body of flesh and blood, which is of a corruptible nature : as our reason may satisfy us, that such gross earthly bodies, as we now carry about with us, cannot live and subsist in those pure regions of light and glory, which God inhabits ; no more than you can lodge a stone in the air, or breathe nothing but pure ether : and therefore our glorified bodies will have none of these earthly passions which these earthly bodies have, will relish none of the pleasures of flesh and blood ; that upon this account we may truly say, that when we once put off these bodies, we shall ever after live without them.

Now the use of this observation is so very obvious, that methinks no man can miss it ; for when we consider, that we must put off these bodies, and for ever live without them, the very next thought in course is, that we ought to live without our bodies now, as much as we possibly can, while we do live in them ; to have but very little commerce with flesh and sense ; to wean ourselves from all bodily pleasures, to stifle its appetites and inclinations, and to bring them under perfect command and government ; that when we see it fit, we may use bodily pleasures without fondness, or let them alone without being uneasy for want of them ; that is, that we may govern all our bodily appetites, not they govern us.

For a wise man should thus reason with himself : if I grow so fond of this body, and the pleasures of it, if I can relish no other pleasures, if I value nothing else, what shall I do, when I leave this body ? For bodily pleasures can last no longer than my body does ; what shall I do in the next world, when I shall be stripped of this body, when I shall be a naked soul ; or whatever other covering I may have, I shall have no flesh and blood about me ; and therefore all the pleasures I value now, will then vanish like a dream ; for it is impossible to enjoy bodily pleasures when I have no body ? And though there were no other punishments in the next life, yet it is a great pain to me now, to have my desires disappointed, or delayed ; and should I retain the same fondness for these things in the next world, where they cannot be had, the eternal despair of enjoying them would be punishment enough.

Indeed we cannot tell what alteration our putting off these bodies will make in the temper and disposition of our minds. We see that a long and severe fit of sickness, while it lasts, will make men absolute philosophers, and give them a great contempt of bodily pleasures ; nay, will make the very thoughts of those pleasures nauseous to them, which they were very fond of in health. Long fasting and abstinence, and other bodily severities, are an excellent means to alter the habits and inclinations of the mind ; and one would think, that to be separated from these bodies, must needs make a greater alteration in our minds, than either sickness or bodily severities : that I dare not say, that a sensual man, when he is separated from this body, shall feel the same sensual desires and inclinations, which he had in it, and shall be tormented with a violent thirst after those pleasures which he cannot enjoy in a separate state : but this I dare say, that a man who is wholly sunk into flesh and sense, and relishes no other pleasures, is not capable of living happily out of his body ; unless you could find out a new scene of material and sensible pleasures to entertain him ; for though the particular appetites and inclinations of the body may cease, yet his very soul is sensualized, and therefore is incapable of the pleasures of a spiritual life.

For indeed setting aside that mischief, which the unruly lust and appetites of men, and immoderate use of bodily pleasures does either to the persons themselves, or to public societies ; and the true reason why we must mortify our sensual inclinations, is to improve our minds in all divine graces ; for the flesh and the spirit cannot thrive together ; sensual and spiritual joys are so contrary to each other, that which of them soever prevails, according to the degrees of its prevalence, it stifles and suppresses, or wholly subdues the other. A soul which is ravished with love of God, and the blessed Jesus, transported with the spiritual hopes of another life, which feels the passion of devotion, and is enamored with the glories and beauties of holiness and divine virtues, must have such a very mean opinion of flesh and sense, as will make it disgust bodily pleasures, or be very indifferent about them : and a soul which is under the government of sense and passion, cannot taste those more intellectual and divine joys ; for it is our esteem of things which gives a relish to them, and it is impossible we can highly esteem one, without depreciating and undervaluing the other. It is universally true in this case, what our Savior tells us, No man can serve two masters, for either he will hate the one, and love the other, or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other : ye cannot serve God and mamon, Matth. vi. 24.

The least beginnings of a divine nature in us, is to love God above all the world ; and as we every day grow more devoutly and passionately in love with God, and to take greater pleasure in the spiritual acts of religion, in praising God, and contemplating the divine nature and perfections, and meditating on the spiritual glories of another life, so we abate of our value for present things, till we get a perfect conquest and mastery of them. But he who is perfectly devoted to the pleasures of the body, and the service of his lusts, has no spiritual life in him ; and though putting off these bodies may cure our bodily appetites and passions, yet it cannot give us a new principle of life, nor work an essential change in a fleshly nature ; and therefore such a man, when he is removed from this body, and all the enjoyments of it, is capable of no other happiness : nay, though we are renewed by the divine spirit, and have a principle of a new life in us, yet, according to the degree of our love to present things, so much the more indisposed are we for the happiness of unbodied spirits.

And therefore, since we must put off these bodies, if we would live forever happily without them, we must begin betimes to shake off matter and sense, to govern our bodily appetites and passions, to grow indifferent to the pleasures of sense, to use them for the refreshment and necessities of nature, but not to be over curious about them, not to be fond of enjoying them, nor troubled for the want of them ; never to indulge ourselves in unlawful pleasures, and to be very temperate in our use of lawful ones ; to be sure we must take care, that the spiritual part, that the sense of God, and of religion, be always predominant in us ; and this will be a principle of life in us, a principle of divine sensations and joys, when this body shall tumble into dust.

VI. If death be our putting off these bodies, then the resurrection from the dead, is the reunion of soul and body : the soul does not die, and therefore cannot be said to rise again from the dead ; but it is the body, which like seed falls into the earth, and springs up again more beautiful and glorious at the resurrection of the just. To believe the resurrection of the body, or of the flesh, and to believe another life after this, are two very different things : the heathens believed a future state, but never dreamt of the resurrection of the body, which is the peculiar article of the christian faith. And yet it is the resurrection of our bodies, which is our victory and triumph over death ; for death was the punishment of Adam's sin ; and those who are in a separate state, still suffer the curse of the law, Dust thou art and to dust thou shalt return. Christ came to deliver us from this curse, by being made a curse for us ; that is, to deliver us from death by dying for us. But no man can be said to be delivered from death, till his body rise again, for part of him is under the power of death still, while his body rots in the grave : nay, he is properly in a state of death, while he is in a state of separation of soul and body, which is the true notion of death : and therefore St. Paul calls the resurrection of the body, the destroying of death, 1 Cor. xv. 25, 26. He must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet, the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death : that is, by the resurrection of the dead, as appears from the whole scope of the place, and is particularly expressed, 54, 55. &c. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass, that saying which is written, death is swallowed up in victory : O death, where is thy sting ! O grave, where is thy victory ! The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law ; but blessed be God, who hath given us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. This is the perfection and consummation of our reward, when our bodies shall be raised incorruptible and glorious, when Christ shall change our vile bodies, and make them like to his own most glorious body. I doubt not, but good men are in a very happy state before the resurrection, but yet their happiness is not complete ; for the very state of separation is an imperfect state, because a separate soul is not a perfect man : a man, by the original constitution of his nature, consists of soul and body ; and therefore his perfect happiness requires the united glory and happiness of both parts, of the whole man. Which is not considered by those who cannot apprehend any necessity, why the body should rise again, since, as they conceive, the soul might be as completely and perfectly happy without it. But yet the soul would not be an entire and perfect man : for a man consists of soul and body : a soul in a state of separation, how happy soever otherwise it may be, has still this mark of God's displeasure on it, that it has lost its body, and therefore the re-union of our souls and bodies has at least this advantage it it, that it is a perfect restoring of us to the divine favor, that the badge and memorial of our sin and apostacy is done away, in the resurrection of our bodies ; and therefore this is called the adoption, viz. the redemption of our bodies, Rom. viii. 23. For then it is that God publicly owns us for his sons, when he raises our dead bodies into a glorious and immortal life. And besides this, I think, we have no reason to doubt, but the re-union of soul and body will be a new addition of happiness and glory ; for though we cannot guess what the pleasures of glorified bodies are, yet sure we cannot imagine, that when these earthly bodies are the instruments of so many pleasures, a spiritual and glorified body should be of no use : a soul and body cannot be vitally united, but there must be a sympathy between them, and receive mutual impressions from each other ; and then we need not doubt, but that such glorified bodies will highly minister, though in a way unknown to us, to the pleasures of a divine and perfect soul ; will infinitely more contribute to the divine pleasures of the mind, than these earthly bodies do to our sensual pleasures. That all who have this hope and expectation, may, as St. Paul speaks, earnestly groan within themselves, waiting for the adoption, even the redemption, of our bodies, Rom. viii. 23. This being the day of the marriage of the Lamb, this consummates our happiness ; when our bodies and souls meet again, not no disturb and oppose each other, as they do in this world, where the flesh and the spirit are at perpetual enmity, but to live in eternal harmony, and to heighten and inflame each other's joys. Now this consideration, that death being a putting off of these bodies, the resurrection of the dead must be the raising of our bodies into a new and immortal life ; and the re-union of them to our souls, suggests many useful thoughts to us : For.

This teaches us how we are to use our bodies, how we are to prepare them for immortality and glory. Death, which is the separation of soul and body, is the punishment of sin, and indeed it is the cure of it too ; for sin is such a leprosy as cannot be perfectly cleansed without pulling down the house, which it has once infected : but if we would have these bodies raised up again immortal and glorious, we must begin the cleansing and purification of them here. We must be sanctified throughout both in body, soul and spirit, 1 Thess. v. 23. Our bodies must be the temples of the holy Ghost, must be holy and consecrated places, 1 Cor. vi. 19. must not be polluted with filthy lusts, if we would have them rebuilt again by the divine Spirit, after the desolations which sin hath made. Thus St. Paul tells us at large, Rom. viii. 10, 11, 12, 13. And if Christ be in you, the body is dead, because of sin ; but the spirit is life, because of righteousness : that is, that divine and holy nature, which we received from Christ, will secure the life of our souls, and translate us to a happy state after death ; but it will not secure us from the necessity of dying : our bodies must die as a punishment of sin, and putrefy in the grave ; but yet they are not lost forever, for if the spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead, dwell in you ; he that raised up Jesus from the dead, shall quicken your mortal bodies, by his spirit which dwelleth in you ; that is, if your bodies be cleansed and sanctified, be the tem- ples of the holy Spirit, he will raise them up again into a new life : therefore, brethren, we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh, for if ye live after the flesh ye shall die ; but if ye through the spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live : If ye subdue the fleshly principle, if ye bring the flesh into subjection to the spirit, not only your souls shall live, but your bodies shall be raised again to immortal life. And this is a mighty obligation on us, if we love our bodies, and would have them glorious and immortal, not to pamper the flesh, and gratify its appetites and lusts ; not to yield your members servants to uncleanness and to iniquity unto iniquity, but to yield your members servants to righteousness unto holiness ; that being made free from sin, becoming the servants of God, you may have your fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life. As the same apostle speaks, Rom. vi. 19, 22. it is by our relation to Christ, that our very bodies are his members ; it is by our relation to the holy Spirit, that our bodies are his temples, which entitles our bodies to a glorious resurrection : but will Christ own such bodies for his members, as are members of a harlot ? Will the holy Spirit dwell in such a temple as is defiled with impure lusts ? And therefore such polluted bodies will rise, as they lay down, in dishonor, will rise not to immortal life, but to eternal death.

For can we think those bodies, well prepared for a glorious resurrection, to be refined into spiritual bodies, which are become ten times more flesh than God made them, which are the instruments and the tempters to all impurity ? Is there any reason to expect that such a body should rise again spiritual and glorious, which expires in the flames of lust, which falls a sacrifice in the quarrel of a strumpet, which sinks under the load of its own excesses, and eats and drinks itself into the grave, which scorns to die by Adam's sin, but will die by its own, without expecting till the laws of mortality, according to the ordinary course of nature, must take place ?

Holiness is the only principle of immortality, both to soul and body : those love their bodies best, those honor them most, who make them instruments of virtue ; who endeavor to refine and spiritualize them, and leave nothing of fleshly appetites and inclinations in them : those are kindest to their bodies, who consecrate them for immortality, who take care they shall rise again into the partnership of eternal joys : all the severities of mortification, abstinence from bodily pleasures, watchings, fastings, hard lodging, when they are instruments of a real virtue, not the arts of superstition, when they are intended to subdue our lusts, not to purchase a liberty of sinning, are the most real expressions of honor and respect to these bodies ; it shews how unwilling we are to part with them, or to have them miserable, how desirous we are of their advancement into eternal glories ; for the less of flesh they carry to the grave with them, the more glorious will they rise again. This is offering up our bodies a living sacrifice, when we entirely devote them to the service of God ; and such living sacrifices shall live forever : for if God receives them a living sacrifice, he will preserve them to immortal life.

But the highest honor we can do these bodies, and the noblest use we can put them to, is to offer them up, in a proper sense, a sacrifice to God, that is, willingly and cheerfully to die for God, when he calls us to suffering : first to offer up our souls to God in the pure flames of love and devotion, and then freely to give up our bodies to the stake, or to the gibbet, to wild beasts, or more savage men. This vindicates our bodies from the natural shame and reproach of death : what we call a natural death is very inglorious, it is a mark of dishonor, because it is a punishment of sin ; such bodies at best are sown in dishonor and corruption, at St. Paul speaks ; but to die a martyr, to fall a sacrifice to God, this is a glorious death ; this is not to yield to the laws of mortality, to necessity and fate, but to give back our bodies to God, who gave them to us ; and he will keep that, which we have committed to his trust, to a glorious resurrection : and it will be a surprising and astonishing glory with which such bodies shall rise again, as have suffered for their Lord ; for if we suffer with him, we shall also be glorified together : which seems to imply, that those shall nearest resemble the glory of Christ himself, who suffer as he did.

This is the way to make our bodies immortal and glorious. We cannot keep them long here, they are corruptible bodies, and will tumble into dust ; we must part with them for a while, and if we ever expect and desire a happy meeting again, we must use them with modesty and reverence now. We dishonor our bodies in this world, when we make them instruments of wickedness and lust, and lay an eternal foundation of shame and infamy for them in the next world ; it is a mortal and killing love, to cherish the fleshly principle, to make provision for the flesh, to fulfill the lusts thereof : but if you love your bodies, make them immortal, that though they die, they may rise again out of their graves, with a youthful vigor and beauty ; that they may live forever without pain and sickness, without the decays of age, or the interruptions of sleep, or the fatigue or weariness of labor, without wanting either food or raiment, without the least remains of corruption, without knowing what it is to tempt, or to be tempted, without the least uneasy thought, the least disappointment, the least care, in the full and blissful enjoyment of the eternal and sovereign good.

SECT. III. Death considered as our entrance upon a new and unknown state of life.

III. LET us now consider death as it is an entrance upon a new and unknown state of life ; for it is a new thing to us, to live without these bodies, it is what we have never tried yet, and we cannot guess how we shall feel ourselves, when we are stript of flesh and blood ; what entertainments we shall find in that place, where there is neither eating nor drinking, neither marrying nor giving in marriage ; what kind of business and employment we shall have there, where we have no occasion for any of these things, which employ our time here ; for when we have no use for food, or raiment, or physic, or houses to dwell in, or whatever our union to these bodies makes necessary to us now , all those trades and arts, which are to provide these conveniences for us, must then cease. This must needs be a very surprising change : and though we are assured of a very great happiness in the next world, which infinitely exceeds whatever men call happiness or pleasure here, yet most men are very unwilling to change a known for an unknown happiness ; and it confounds and amazes them to think of going out of these bodies, they know not whither. Now this consideration will suggest several very wise and useful thoughts to us.

1. How necessary an entire trust and faith in God is : we cannot live happily without it in this world, and I am sure we cannot die comfortably without it : for this is the noblest exercise of faith, to be able cheerfully to resign up our spirits into the hands of God, when we know so little of the state of the other world, whither we are going. This was the first trial of Abraham's faith, when, in obedience to the command of God, he forsook his own country, and his father's house, and followed God into a strange land, Heb. xi. 8. By faith Abraham, when he was called to go into a place, which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed, and he went out, not knowing whither he went. Canaan was a type of heaven ; and heaven is as unknown a country to us, as Canaan was to Abraham : and herein we must imitate this father of the faithful, to be contented to leave our native country, and the world we know, to follow God, whithersoever he leads us, into unknown regions, and to an unknown and unexperienced happiness. This indeed all men must do, because they cannot avoid leaving this world, but must go, when God calls for them ; but that which makes it our choice, and an act of faith and virtue, is this, such a strong persuasion of, and firm reliance on the goodness and wisdom and promises of God, that though we are ignorant of the state of the other world, we can cheerfully forsake all our known enjoyments, and embrace the promises of an unknown happiness. And there are two distinct acts of this, which answer to Abraham's faith in leaving his own country, and following God into a strange land: the first is the exercise of our faith while we live, the second when we die.

To mortify all our inordinate appetites and desires, to deny ourselves the sinful vanities and pleasures of this life, for the promises of an unknown happiness in the next world, is our mystical dying to this world, leaving our native country, and following God into a strange and unknown land; to quit all our present possessions in this world, to forfeit our estates, our liberties, all that is dear to us here; nay, to forsake our native country, rather than offend God, and lose our title to the promises of an unknown happiness is in a literal sense, to leave our own country at God's command, not knowing whither we go; which is like Abraham's going out of his own country, and living a sojourner in the land of promise, without having any inheritance in it: this is that faith which overcomes the world, which makes us live as pilgrims and strangers here, as these who seek for another country, for a heavenly Canaan, as the apostle tells us Abraham did: For by faith he sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promise; for he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God, Heb. xi. 9, 10.

And when we come to die, and can with joy and triumph in an assurance of Gods promises, commend our spirits to him, and trust him with our souls, when we know not the country we go to, and never experienced what the happiness of it is, without any concern or solicitude about it ; this is a noble act of faith, which does great honor to God, and conquers all the natural aversions to death, and makes it an easy thing to leave this world, and the object of our desire and choice to see that promised land, and taste those pleasures which we are yet strangers to. We must live, and we must die in faith too, as the patriarchs did, who all died in faith, not having received the promises, but seeing them afar off ; and for that reason, the other world must be in a great measure unknown to us, for could we see it, could we beforehand taste the pleasures of it, or know what they are, it would be no act of faith to leave this world for it, to be willing to be translated from earth to heaven ; but no man is worthy of heaven, who dares not take God's word for it ; and therefore God has concealed those glories from us, and given us only a promise of a great but an unknown happiness, for the object of our hope, to be a trial of our faith and obedience and trust in him.

That the other world is an unknown state to us, trains us up to a great trust and confidence in God ;

for we must trust God for our souls, and for the next world, and this naturally teaches us to trust God in this world too ; to live securely upon his providence, and to suffer him to dispose of us, as he pleases.

Indeed no man can trust God in this world, who has not a stedfast faith in God, for the rewards of the next : for the external administrations of providence are not always what we could wish ; but good men are very well contented, and have great reason to be so, to take this world and the next together ; and therefore are not solicitous about present things, but leave God to choose what condition for them he pleases, as being well assured of his goodness, who has prepared for them eternal rewards.

And those who can trust God with their souls, who can trust him for an immortal life, for an unseen and unknown happiness, will find no difficulty in trusting him for this world ; I mean those who are concerned for their future happiness, and take any care of their souls. If all who are unconcerned for their souls, and never trouble their heads, what will become of them hereafter, may be said to trust God with their souls, then, I confess, this will not hold true ; for the greatest number of those who thus trust God with their souls, will trust him for nothing else. But this is not to trust God, but to be careless of our souls ; but now, when a man who stedfastly believes another life after this, and is heartily concerned, what will become of him for ever, can securely rely on God's promises, beyond his own knowledge and prospect of things : he will very easily trust God for every thing else : for he is not so solicitous about any thing in this world, as he is for his soul ; and if he can trust God with his dearest interests, surely he will trust him in less matters. The promises of eternal life, through our Lord Jesus Christ, are the highest demonstrations of God's love to us ; and he who is so well assured of God's love, that he can trust him for heaven, can never distrust his care and providence in this world. The methods of God's providence can never be so unknown to us in this world, as the state of the other world is unknown ; and if we can cheerfully follow God into an unseen and unknown world, cannot we be contented to follow him through the most dark and perplexed tracks of providence here ? So that we have as little reason to complain, that the state of the other is unknown to us, as we have, that we must live by faith in this world ; for absent, unseen, and unknown things, are the objects of our faith : and those who will trust God no farther than they can see, neither in this world nor in the next, have no reason to depend upon his providence here, nor to expect heaven hereafter.

2ly, The state of the other world being so much unknown to us, is a very good reason, why we should cheerfully comply with all the terms and conditions of the gospel ; to do whatever our Savior requires, that we may obtain eternal life. This, it may be, you will not so readily apprehend, and yet the reason of it is very plain ; for since the state of the other world is so much unknown to us, we do not, and cannot know neither, what dispositions and habits and complexion of soul are necessary to fit and qualify us for this unknown happiness. But our Savior, who knew what that state is, knew also what is necessary to that state ; and therefore the wisest course we can take, is to obey all his laws without any dispute, not only as the conditions of happiness, without which we shall not be admitted into heaven, but as the necessary preparations for it. As to explain this by a parallel case, which you will easily understand : suppose we had pre-existed in a former state, as some say we did, before we came into these bodies ; and before we knew any thing of this world, or what the pleasures and entertainments of it are, should have been told what kind of bodies we must go into, no doubt but there would have been wonderful wise disputes about the make and frame of our bodies ; we should have thought some part superfluous, or useless, or ill contrived ; indeed, should have wondered what such a body was made for, as well we might, before we understood the use of any other part of it : but God, who knew what he intended us for, provided such a body for us, as is both beautiful and useful ; and we cannot want any part of it, but we are deprived of some conveniences and pleasures of life. And thus we may easily suppose it to be, with reference to the next world, that the habits and tempers of our minds are as necessary to relish the pleasures of that state, as our bodily senses are to taste bodily pleasures ; and since we do not particularly know what the delights of that state are, and Christ does, we ought as perfectly to resign up ourselves to his directions for the fashioning our minds, as we trust God to form our bodies for us. Whatever graces and virtues he requires us to exercise in this world, though we do not see the present use of them, tho' we may think them an unnecessary restraint of our liberties, and very needless and unreasonable severities, yet we ought to conclude, that Christ knew the reason of such commands, and that such qualities and dispositions of mind, will be found as necessary in the next world, as our bodily senses are here.

And this we ought especially to conclude of such degrees and instances of virtue, as seem above our present state, and not so well fitted to our condition of life in this world ; for why should our Savior give us such laws, and exact such a degree of virtue from us here, as abridges our present enjoyments, and it may be exposes us to great inconveniences and sufferings, were not that temper of mind, which these virtues form in us, of great use and necessity in the next life ? As for instance ;

We should think it sufficient, while we live in this world, where there are so many inviting objects ; and while we are clothed with bodies of flesh, which are made for the enjoyments of sense, and have natural appetites and inclinations to them, so to govern ourselves in the use of these pleasures, as neither to make ourselves beasts, nor to injure our neighbors ; and while we keep within these bounds, to gratify our appetites and inclinations to the full ; for it is certainly the happiness of an earthly creature to enjoy this world, though a reasonable creature must do it reasonably : But not to love this world, seems a hard command to a creature who lives in it, and was made to enjoy it ; to despise bodily pleasures, to subdue the fleshly principle in us, not only to reason, but to the spirit, to live above the body, and to strive to stifle not only its irregular, but even its natural appetites, and to taste the pleasures of it very sparingly, and with great indifference of mind, seems a very hard saying to flesh and blood : we should think it time enough to have our conversation in heaven, when we come thither ; but it is plainly above the state of an earthly creature, to live in heaven, to have all our joys, our hopes, our treasure, and our hearts there : the state of this world would be very happy and prosperous without such a raised, and refined, and spiritualized mind ; and therefore these are such virtues as are not necessary to the present constitution of this world, and therefore can be only in order to the next.

Thus it is sufficient to the happiness and good government of this world, that men do no injury to each other, and that they express mutual civilities and respects, that they take care of those whom nature has endeared to them, and that they be just, and in ordinary cases helpful to others ; and therefore this is all, that the state of this world requires. But that divine and universal charity, which teaches us to love all men as ourselves, even our enemies, and those who hate and persecute us ; to forgive the injuries we suffer, and not to revenge and retaliate them, not to render evil for evil, nor railing for railing, but on the contrary, blessing : I say, this wonderful virtue does not only lie extremely cross to self love, but is hardly reconcilable with the state of this world : for the practice of it is very dangerous when we live among bad men, who will take advantage of such a bearing and forgiving virtue, to give great occasions for the constant exercise of it, and nothing but a particular providence, which watches over such good men, can secure them from being an easy prey to the wicked and unjust : nay, we see, this is not practicable in the government of the world ; civil magistrates are forced to punish evil doers, or the world would be a Bedlam ; and therefore those who have thought such public executions of justice, to be inconsistent with this law of forgiving injuries, and not revenging ourselves, have made it unlawful for christians to be magistrates, because hanging, or whipping, or pilloring malefactors, is not forgiving them, as certainly it is not : A very absurd doctrine, which makes it necessary that there should always be heathens in every nation, to govern even a christian kingdom, or that the christian world should have no government at all, though nominal and profest christians have as much need of government as ever any heathens had. But this forgiving enemies is only a private virtue not the rule of public government ; which shews, that the state of this world is so far from requiring this virtue, that it will admit only the private exercise of it, and that too under the protection of a particular providence, to defend those good men who must not avenge themselves. Now such virtues as the state of this world does not require, we must conclude, are only in order to the next, and that though we do not so well discern the reason and use of this divine charity here, yet this temper of mind is absolutely necessary to the happiness of the other world ; and for that reason it is, that Christ requires the exercise of it now ; for we cannot imagine any other reason why our Savior should make any acts of virtue, which the state of this world does not require the present exercise of, the necessary terms and conditions of our future happiness, but only that such dispositions of mind are as necessary to qualify us to relish those divine pleasures, as our bodily senses are to perceive the delights and pleasures of this world. This is a mighty obligation on us to obey the laws of our Savior, as the methods of our advancement to eternal glory ; not to dispute his commands, how uneasy or unreasonable soever they may now appear, for the reasons of them are not to be fetched from this world, but from the next ; and therefore are such, as we cannot so well understand now, because we know so little of the next world ; but we may safely conclude that Christ knows a reason for it, and that we shall quickly understand the reason of it, when we come into the other world : and therefore we should endeavor to exercise all those heights of virtue, which the gospel recommends to us, for as much as we fall short of these, so will our glory and happiness abate in the other world.

3ly, Though the state we enter on at death, be in a great measure unknown to us, yet this is no reasonable discouragement to good men, nor encouragement to the bad : 1. It is no reasonable discouragement to good men ; for though we do not know what it is, yet we know it is a great happiness ; so it is represented to us in scripture, as a kingdom, and a crown, an eternal kingdom, and a never fading crown : now would any man be unwilling to leave a mean and homely cottage to go and take possession of a kingdom, because he had never yet seen it, though he had heard very glorious things of it, from very faithful and credible witnesses ? For let us consider a little in what sense the happiness of the other world is unknown.

1. That it is not such a kind of happiness as is in this world, that it is like nothing, which we have seen or tasted yet : but a wise and good man cannot think this any disparagement to the other world, though it would have been a real disparagement to it, had it been like this world : for here is nothing but vanity and vexation of spirit, nothing but an empty scene, which makes a fine show, but has no real and solid joys : good men have enough of this world, and are sufficiently satisfied, that none of these things can make them happy, and therefore cannot think it any disadvantage to change the scene, and try some unknown and unexperienced joys ; for if there be such a thing as happiness to be found, it must be something which they have not known yet, something that this world does not afford.

2. When we say, that the state of the other world is unknown, the only meaning of it is, that it is a state of such happiness, so far beyond any thing we ever experienced yet, that we cannot form any notion or idea of it ; we know that there is such a happiness, we know in some measure wherein this happiness consists, viz. In seeing God, and the blessed Jesus, who loved us, and gave himself for us ; in praising our great Creator and Redeemer ; in conversing with saints and angels ; but how great how ravishing and transporting a pleasure this is, we cannot tell, because we never yet felt it ; our dull devotions, our imperfect conceptions of God in this world, cannot help us to guess what the joys of heaven are ; we know not how the sight of God, how the thoughts of him, will pierce our souls ; with what extasies and raptures we shall sing the song of the Lamb ; with what melting affections perfect souls shall embrace ; what glories and wonders we shall see and know ; Such things as neither eye hath seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive. Now methinks this should not make the thoughts of death uneasy to us, should not make us unwilling to go to heaven ; that the happiness of heaven is too great for us to know, or to conceive in this world : For,

3. Men are naturally fond of unknown and untried pleasures ; which is so far from being a disparagement to them, that this itself raises our expectations of them, that they are unknown : In the things of this world, enjoyment usually lessens our esteem and value for them, and we always value that most, which we have never tried ; and methinks the happiness of the other world should not be the only thing we despise, before we try it ; all present things are mean, and appear to be so, when they are enjoyed :

but whatever expectations we have of the unknown happiness of the other world, the enjoyment of it will as much exceed, our highest expectations, as other things usually fall below them ; that we shall be forced to confess, with the queen of Sheba, when she saw Solomon's glory, that not the half of it was told her : It is some encouragement to us, that the happiness of heaven is too great to be known in this world ; for did we perfectly know it now, it could not be very great ; and therefore we should entertain ourselves with the hope of this unknown happiness, of those joys, which now we have such imperfect conceptions of. 2. Nor is it on the other hand any encouragement to bad men, that the miseries of the other world are unknown ; for it is known, that God has threatened very terrible punishments against bad men ; and that what these punishments are, is unknown, makes them a great deal more formidable ; for who knows the power of God's wrath ? who knows how miserable God can make bad men ? This makes it a senseless thing for men to harden themselves against the fears of the other world, because they know not what it is ; and how then can they tell, though they could bear up under all known miseries, but that there may be such punishments as they cannot bear ? That they are unknown, argues, that they are something more terrible than they are acquainted with in this world ; they are represented indeed by the most dreadful and terrible things, by lakes of fire and brimstone, blackness of darkness, and the worm that never dieth, and the fire that never goeth out : but bad men think this cannot be true in a literal sense, that there can be no fire to burn souls, and torment them eternally. Now suppose it were so, yet if they believe these threatenings, they must believe that some terrible thing is signified by everlasting burnings ; and if fire and brimstone serve only for metaphors to describe these torments by, what will the real sufferings of the damned be ! for the spirit of God does not use to describe things by such metaphors as are greater than the things themselves. And therefore let no bad man encourage himself in sin, because he does not know what the punishments of the other world, are. This should possess us with the greater awe and dread of them, since every thing in the other world, not only the happiness, but the miseries of it, will prove greater, not less, than we expect.

CHAP. II.

Concerning the certainty of our death.

HAVING thus shewed you under what notions we are to consider death, and what wisdom we should learn from them, I proceed to the second thing, the certainty of death : It is appointed to man once to die. ὁ ἀποκρίνεται, it remains, it is reserved, and, as it were, laid up for them.

I believe no man will desire a proof of this, which he sees with his eyes ; one generation succeeds another, and those who live longest, at last yield to the fatal stroke. There were two men indeed, Enoch and Elias, who did not die, as death signifies the separation of soul and body, but were translated to heaven without dying ; but this is the general law for mankind, from which none are excepted, but those whom God by his sovereign authority, and for wise reasons thinks fit to except ; which have been but two since the creation, and will be no more till Christ comes to judge the world : for then St. Paul tells us, those who are alive at Christ's second coming shall not die, but shall be changed, 1 Cor. xv. 51, 52. Behold I shew you a mystery, we shall not at all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump ; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed. This is such a change as is equivalent to death, it puts us in the same state with those who are dead, and at the last judgment shall rise again.

SECT. I. A vindication of the justice and goodness of God, in appointing death for all men.

But before I shew you what use to make of this consideration, that we must all certainly die, let us examine, how mankind comes to be mortal : this was no dispute among the heathens, for it was no great wonder that an earthly body should die, and dissolve again into dust : it would be a much greater wonder to see a body of flesh and blood preserved in perpetual youth and vigor, without any decays of nature, without being sick or growing old. But this is a question among us ; or if it may not be called a question, yet it is what deserves our consideration, since we learn from the history of Moses, that as frail and brittle as these earthly tabernacles are, yet if man had not sinned, he had not died.

When God created man, and placed him in paradise, he forbade him to eat of the tree of knowledge of good and evil : Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat, but of the tree of knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat of it ; for in the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die, Gen. ii. 16, 17. And when, notwithstanding this threatening, our first parents had eat of it, God confirms and ratifies the sentence, dust thou art, and to dust thou shalt return, Gen. iii. 19. What this tree of knowledge of good and evil was, is as great a mystery to us, as what the tree of life was, for we understand neither of them ; which makes some men, who would not be thought to be ignorant of any thing, to fly to allegorical senses : but though I would be glad to know this, if I could, yet I must be contented to leave it a mystery, as I find it. That which we are concerned in, is, that this sentence of death and mortality, which was pronounced on Adam, fell on all his posterity : As St. Paul tells us, 1 Cor. xv. 21, 22. That by man came death, and in Adam all die. And this he does not only assert, but prove, Rom. v. 12, 13, 14. Wherefore by man, sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned : for until the law sin was in the world, but sin is not imputed, where there is no law ; nevertheless death reigned from Adam till Moses, even over them who had not sinned, after the similitude of Adam's transgression. The design of all which is to prove, that men die, or are mortal, not for their own sins, but the sin of Adam : which the apostle proves by this argument, because though all men, as well as Adam, have sinned, yet till the giving the law of Moses, there was no law, which threatened death against sin, but only that the law given to Adam in paradise, which no man else ever did, or ever could transgress, but he : Now sin is not imputed where there is no law : that is, it is not imputed to any man to death, before there is any law which threatens death against it : that no man can be reckoned to die for those sins, which no law punishes with death. Upon what account then, says the apostle, could those men die, who lived, between Adam and Moses, before the law was given, which threatens death ? and yet die they all did, even those who had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression ; who had neither eaten the forbidden fruit, nor sinned against any other express law threatening death : this could be for no other sin but Adam's ; he sinned and brought death into the world, and thus death passed upon all men for his sin, notwithstanding they themselves were sinners ; for though they were sinners, yet that they died, was not owing to their own sins, because they had not sinned against any law, which threatened death, but to the sin of Adam ; and therefore in a proper sense, in Adam all die.

Now this is thought very hard, that the sin of Adam should bring death upon all his posterity, that one man sinned, and all men must die ; and therefore, I suppose no man will think it improper to my present argument, to give you such an account of this matter, as will evidently justify the wisdom and goodness, as well as the justice of God in it.

I. In the first place then I observe, that an immortal life in this world, is not the original right of earthly creatures, but was wholly owing to the grace and favor of God. I call that an original right, which is founded in the nature of things ; for otherwise, properly speaking, no creatures have any right either to being, or to subsistence, which is a continuance in being : it is the goodness and the power of God, which both made the world, and upholds and sustains all things in being. And therefore Plato confesses, that the inferior Gods, those immortal spirits, which he thought worthy of divine honors, were both made by the supreme God, and did subsist by his will : for he who made all things, can annihilate them again, when he pleases ; and therefore their subsistence is as much owing to the divine goodness, as their creation : but yet there is a great difference between the natural gift and bounty of God, and what is supernatural, or above the nature of things : what God makes by nature immortal, so that it has no principles of mortality in its constitution, immortality may be said to be its natural right, because it is by nature immortal, as spirits and the souls of men are : and in this case it would be thought very hard, that a whole race of immortal beings should be made mortal for the sin of one ; which would be to deprive them of their natural right to immortality, without their own fault. But when any creature is immortal, not by nature, but by supernatural grace, God may bestow this supernatural immortality upon what conditions he pleases, and take the forfeiture of it, when he sees fit ; and this was the case of man in innocence. His body was not by nature immortal, for body made of dust, will naturally resolve into dust again ; and therefore without a supernatural power, an earthly body must die ; for which reason God provided a remedy against mortality, the tree of life, which he planted in paradise, and without which man could not be immortal : so that mortality was a necessary consequence of his losing paradise ; for when he was banished from the tree of life, he could have no remedy nor preservative against death. Now, I suppose, no man will question, but God might very justly turn Adam out of paradise for his disobedience, and then he must die, and all his posterity die in him : for he being by nature mortal, must beget mortal children, and having forfeited the tree of life, he and his posterity, who are all shut out of paradise with him, must necessarily die : which takes nothing from them to which any man had a right, (for no man had a natural right to paradise, or the tree of life) but only leaves them to those laws of mortality, to which an earthly creature is naturally subject. God had promised paradise and the tree of life to no man, but to Adam himself, whom he created and placed in paradise ; and therefore he took nothing away from any man, but from Adam, when he thrust him out of paradise ; children indeed must follow the condition of their parents ; had Adam preserved his right to the tree of life, we had enjoyed it too, but he forfeiting it, we lost it in him, and in him die. We lost, I say, not any thing that he had a right to, but such a supernatural privilege, as we might have had, had he preserved his innocence : and this is a sufficient vindication of the justice of God in it. He has done us no injury ; we are by nature mortal creatures, and he leaves us in that mortal state : and to withdraw favors upon a reasonable provocation, is neither hard nor unjust.

II. For we must consider farther, when sin was once entered into the world, an immortal life here became impossible, without a constant series of miracles. Adam had sinned, and thereby corrupted his own nature, and therefore must necessarily propagate a corrupt nature to his posterity : his earthly passions were broke lose, he now knew good and evil, and therefore was in the hands of his own counsel, to refuse or choose the good or evil : and when the animal life was once awakened in him, there was no great dispute, which way his affections would incline. To be sure it is evident enough in his posterity, whose boisterous passions act such tragedies in the world. Now suppose in a state of innocence, that the tree of life would have preserved men immortal, when no man would injure himself, nor another ; when there was no danger from wild beasts, or an intemperate air, or poisonous herbs ; yet, I suppose, no man will say, but that even in paradise itself, (could we suppose any such thing) Adam might have been devoured by a beast, or killed with a stab at the heart, or had there been any poison there, it would have killed him, had he eaten or drunk it, or else he had another kind of body in paradise than we have now, for I am sure that these things would kill us. Consider then how impossible it is, that in this fallen and apostate state, God would preserve man immortal without working miracles every minute : men's passions are now very unruly, and they fall out with one another, and will kill one another, if they can ; of which the other world had a very early example in Cain, who slew his brother Abel ; and all the many murders and bloody wars since that day, put this matter out of doubt : now this can never be prevented, unless God should make our bodies invulnerable, which a body of flesh and blood cannot be without a miracle : some die by their own hands, others by wild beasts, others by evil accidents, and there are so many ways of destroying these brittle bodies, that it is the greatest wonder that they last so long ; and yet Adam's body in paradise was as very earth, and as brittle as our bodies are ; but all this had been prevented, had men continued innocent ; they would not then have quarrelled or fought, they would not have died by their own hands, nor drunk themselves into a fever, nor overloaded nature with riotous excesses ; there had been no wild beasts to devour, no infectious air, or poisonous herbs, and then the tree of life would have repaired all the decays of nature, and preserved a perpetual youth ; but in this state we are now, the tree of life could not preserve us immortal, if a sword or poison can kill : which shews us how impossible it was, but that sin and death must come into the world together : man might have been immortal, had he never sinned ; but brutish and ungoverned passions will destroy us without a miracle. And therefore we have no reason now to quarrel at the divine providence, that we are mortal, for in the ordinary course of providence, it is impossible it should be otherwise.

III. Considering what the state of this world necessarily is, since the fall of man, an immortal life here is not desirable : no state ought to be immortal, if it be designed as an act of favor and kindness, but what is completely happy ; but this world is far enough from being such a state. Some few years give wise men enough of it, though they are not oppressed with any great calamities ; and there are a great many miseries, which nothing but death can give relief too : this puts an end to the sorrows of the poor, of the oppressed, of the persecuted ; it is a haven of rest after all the tempests of a troublesome world ; it knocks off the prisoner's shackles, and sets him at liberty ; it dries up the tears of the widows and fatherless ; it eases the complaints of a hungry belly, and naked back ; it tames the proudest tyrants, and restores peace to the world ; it puts an end to all our labors, and supports men under their present adversities, especially when they have a prospect of a better life after this. The labor and the misery of man under the sun is very great, but it would be intolerable, were it endless : and therefore since sin is entered into the world, and so many necessary miseries and calamities attend it, it is an act of goodness, as well as justice, in God, to shorten this miserable life, and transplant good men into a more happy, as well as immortal state.

IV. Since the fall of man, mortality and death is necessary to the good government of the world : nothing else can give check to some men's wickedness, but either the fear of death, or the execution of it ; some men are so outrageously wicked, that nothing can put a stop to them, and prevent that mischief they do in the world, but to cut them off : this is the reason of capital punishments among men, to remove those out of the world, who will be a plague to mankind, while they live in it. For this reason God destroyed the whole race of mankind, by a deluge of water, excepting Noah and his family, because they were incurably wicked : for this reason he sends plagues, and famines, and sword, to correct the exorbitant growth of wickedness, to lessen the numbers of sinners, and to lay restraints on them : and if the world be such a Bedlam as it is under all these restraints, what would it be, were it filled with immortal sinners !

Ever since the fall of Adam, there always was, and ever will be a mixture of good and bad men in the world : and justice requires that God should reward the good, and punish the wicked : but that cannot be done in this world ; for these present external enjoyments are not the proper rewards of virtue. There is no complete happiness here ; man was never turned into this world, till he sinned, and was flung out of paradise ; which is an argument, that God never intended this world for a place of rewards and perfect happiness ; nor is this world a proper place for the final punishment of bad men, because good men live among them : and without a miracle bad men cannot be greatly punished, but good men must share with them ; and were all bad men punished to their deserts, it would make this world the very image and picture of hell, which would be a very unfit place for good men to live and to be happy in : as much as good men suffer from the wicked in this world, it is much more tolerable, than to have their ears filled with the perpetual cries of such miserable sinners, and their eyes terrified with such perpetual and amazing executions : good and bad men must be separated, before the one can be finally rewarded, or the other punished, and such a separation as this, cannot be made in this world, but must be reserved for the next.

So that considering the fallen state of man, it was not fitting, it was not for the good of mankind, that they should be immortal here. Both the wisdom, and goodness, and justice of God required, that man should die, which is an abundant justification of this divine decree, that it is appointed for men once to die.

V. As a farther justification of the divine goodness in this, we may observe, that before God pronounced that sentence on Adam, dust thou art, and to dust thou shalt return, he expressly promised, that the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head, Gen. iii. 15. In his curse upon the serpent, who beguiled Eve, I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed ; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel : which contains the promise of sending Christ into the world who, by death should destroy him, who had the power of death, that is, the devil ; and deliver them, who through fear of death, were all their life time subject to bondage, Heb. ii. 14, 15. i. e. before he denounces the sentence of death against a man, he promises a Savior and deliverer, who should triumph over death, and raise our dead bodies out of the dust, immortal and glorious. Here is a most admirable mixture of mercy and judgement ! Man had forfeited an earthly immortality, and must die ; but before God would denounce the sentence of death against him, he promises to raise up his dead body again to a new and endless life : and have we any reason to complain then, that God has dealt hardly with us, in involving us in the sad consequences of Adam's sin, and exposing us to a temporal death, when he has promised to raise us from the dead again, and to bestow a more glorious immortality on us, which we shall never lose. When man sinned, it was necessary that he should die, because he could never be completely and perfectly happy, in this world, as you have already heard ; and the only possible way to make him happy, was to translate him into another world, and to bestow a better immortality on him : this God has done, and that in a very stupendious way, by giving his own Son to die for us ; and now we have little reason to complain, that we all die in Adam, since we are made alive in Christ : to have died in Adam, never to have lived more, had indeed been very severe upon mankind ; but when death signifies only a necessity of going out of these bodies, and living without them for sometime, in order to re-assume them again immortal and glorious, we have no reason to think this any great hurt : nay, indeed, if we consider things aright, the divine goodness has improved the fall of Adam, to the raising of mankind to a more happy and perfect state : for though a paradise, where God placed Adam in innocence, was a happier state of life than this world, freed from all the disorders of a mortal body, and from all the necessary cares and troubles of this life, yet you will all grant that heaven is a happier place than an earthly paradise ; and therefore it is more for our happiness to be translated from earth to heaven, than to have lived always in an earthly paradise : you will all grant, that the state of good men, when they go out of these bodies, before the resurrection, is a happier life than paradise was, for it is to be with Christ, as St. Paul tells us, which is far better, Phil. i. 23. And when our bodies rise again from the dead, you will grant they will be more glorious bodies than Adam's was in innocence : for the first man was of the earth earthly, but the second man is the Lord from heaven, 1 Cor. xv. 47. Adam had an earthly mortal body, though it should have been immortal by grace ; but at the resurrection our bodies shall be fashioned like unto Christ's most glorious body : The righteous shall shine forth like the sun in the kingdom of the father : that as we have born the image of the earthly, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly, 1 Cor. xv. 49. So that our redemption by Christ has infinitely the advantage of Adam's fall, and we have no reason to complain, that by man came death, since by man also came the resurrection of the dead. That St. Paul might well magnify the grace of God in our redemption by Christ, above his justice and severity, in punishing Adam's sin with death, Rom. v. 15, 16, 17. But not as the offence, so also is the free gift : for if through the offence of one many be dead ; much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many.

And not as it was by one that sinned, so is the gift : for the judgement was by one to condemnation ; but the free gift is of many offences unto justification. For if by one man's offence, death reigned by one ; much more they which receive abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness, shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ. Where the apostle magnifies the grace of God upon a fourfold account : 1. That death was the just reward of sin, it came by the offence of one, and was an act of justice in God ; whereas our redemption by Christ is the gift of grace, the free gift, which we had no just claim to. 2. That by Christ we are not only delivered from the effects of Adam's sin, but from the guilt of our own : For though the judgement was by one to condemnation ; the free gift is of many offences unto justification. 3. That though we die in Adam, we are not barely made alive again in Christ, but shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ ; which is a much happier life, than what we lost in Adam. 4. That as we die by one man's offence, so we live by one too ; By the righteousness of one, the free gift comes upon all men unto justification of life. We have no reason to complain, that the sin of Adam is imputed to us to death, if the righteousness of Christ purchase for us eternal life. The first was a necessary consequence of Adam's losing paradise ; the second is wholly owing to the grace of God.

Thus we see, what it is that makes us mortal: God did not make death; he created us in a happy and immortal state, but by man sin entered into the world, and death by sin. Whatever aversion then we have to death, should beget in us a great horror of sin, which did not only at first make us mortal, but is to this day both the cause of death, and the sting of it: no degree indeed of virtue now can preserve us from dying; but yet virtue may prolong our lives, and make them happy, while sin very often hastens us to the grave, and cuts us off in the very midst of our days. An intemperate and lustful man destroys the most vigorous constitution of body, dies of a fever, or a dropsy, or rottenness and consumptions; others fall a sacrifice to private revenge, or public justice, or a divine vengeance, for the wicked shall not live out half their days. However, setting aside some little natural aversions, which are more easily conquered, and death were a very innocent, harmless, nay, desirable thing, did not sin give a sting to it, and terrify us with the thoughts of that judgement, which is to follow: quarrel not then at the divine justice in appointing death; God is very good, as well as just in it, but vent all your indignation against sin; pull out this sting of death, and then you will see nothing but smiles and charms in it; then it is nothing but putting off these mortal bodies, to re-assume them again with all the advantages of an immortal youth. It is certain indeed we must die, this is appointed for us, and the very certainty of our death will teach us that wisdom which may help us to regain a better immortality than we have lost.

SECT. II. How to improve this consideration, that we must certainly die.

FOR, 1. If it be certain that we must die, this should teach us frequently to think of death, to keep it always in our eye and view : for, why should we cast off the thoughts of that which will certainly come, especially when it is so necessary to the good government of our lives, to remember that we must die ? If we must die, I think it concerns us to take care, that we may die happily, and that depends upon our living well ; and nothing has such a powerful influence upon the good government of our lives, as the thoughts of death. I have already shewed you, what wisdom death will teach us ; but no man will learn this, who does not consider what it is to die ; and no man will practise it, who does not often remember that he must die ; but he that lives under a constant sense of death, has a perpetual antidote against the follies and vanities of this world, and a perpetual spur to virtue.

When such a man finds his desires after this world enlarge beyond, not only the wants, but the conveniences of nature, thou fool, says he to himself, what is the meaning of all this ? what kindles this insatiable thirst of riches ? why must there be no end of adding house to house, and field to field ? is this world thy home, is this thy abiding city ? dost thou hope to take up an eternal rest here ? vain man ! thou must shortly remove thy dwelling, and then whose shall all these things be ? death will shortly close thy eyes, and then thou shalt not so much as see the God thou worshipest ; the earth shall shortly cover thee, and then thou shalt have thy mouth and belly full of clay and dust. Such thoughts as these will cool our desires to this present world ; will make us contented when we have enough, and very charitable and liberal of what we can spare : for what should we do with more in this world, than will carry us through it ? What better and wiser use can we make of such riches, as we cannot carry with us into the other world, than to return them thither beforehand in acts of piety and charity, that we may receive the rewards and recompences of them in a better life ? that we may make to ourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, that when we fail, they may receive us into everlasting habitations.

When he finds his mind to begin to swell, and to encrease as fortune and honors do, Lord, thinks he, what a bubble is this ! which every breath of air can blow away. How vain a thing is man in his greatest glory, who appears gay and beautiful like a flower in the spring, and is as soon cut down and withered ! Though we should meet with no change in our fortune here, yet we shall suddenly be removed out of this world ; the scene of this life will change, and there is an end of earthly greatness. And what a contemptible mind is that, which is swelled with dying honors, which looks big indeed, as a body does which is swelled out of all proportion with a dropsy, or timpany, but that is its disease, not a natural beauty. What am I better than the poorest man, who begs an alms, unless I be wiser and more virtuous than he ? Can lands and houses, great places and titles, things which are not ours, and which we cannot keep, make such a mighty difference between one man and another ? Are these the riches, are these the beauties and glories of a spirit ? Are we not all made of the same mould ? Is not God the father of us all ? Must we not all die alike, and lie down in the dust together ? And can the different parts we act in this world, which are not so long as the scene of a play, compared to an eternal duration, make such a vast difference between men ? This will make men humble and modest in the highest fortune, as minding them, that when they are got to the top-round of honor, if they keep from falling, yet they must be carried down again, and laid as low as the dust.

Thus, when he finds the body growing upon the mind, and intoxicating it with the love of sensual pleasures, he remembers, that his body must die, and all these pleasures must die with it ; that they are indeed killing pleasures, which kill a mortal body before its time ; that it does not become a man who is but 'a traveller' in this world, but a pilgrim and a stranger here, to study ease and softness, and luxury ; that a soul which must live for ever, should seek after more lasting pleasures, which may survive the funeral of the body, and be a spring of ravishing joys, when he is stript of flesh and blood. These are the thoughts which the consideration of death will suggest to us, as I have already shewed you : and it is impossible for a man, who has always these thoughts at hand, to be much imposed on by the pageantry of this world, by the transient honors and pleasures of it.

.

It is indeed, I think, a very impracticable rule, which some men give, to live always, as if we were to die the next moment. Our lives should always be as innocent, as if we were immediately to give up our accounts to God ; but it is impossible to have always those sensible apprehensions of death about us, which we have when we see it approaching : but though we cannot live as if we were immediately to die, (which would put an end not only to innocent mirth, but to all the necessary business of the world, which I believe no dying man would concern himself for,) yet we may, and we ought to live as those who must certainly die, and ought to have these thoughts continually about us, as a guard upon our actions : for whatever is of such mighty consequence to us, as death is, if it be certain, ought always to give laws to our behavior and conversation.

2ly, If it be certain we must die, the very first thing we ought to do in this world, after we come to years of understanding, should be to prepare for death, that whenever death comes, we may be ready for it.

This, I confess, is not according to the way of this world ; for dying is usually the last thing they take care of : this is thought a little unseasonable, while men are young, and healthful, and vigorous : but besides the uncertainty of our lives, and that it is possible, while we delay, death may seize on us before we are provided for it ; and then we must be miserable for ever ; which I shall speak to under the next head ; I doubt not but to convince every considering man, that an early preparation for death, is the very best means to make our lives happy in this world, while we do continue here. Nor shall I urge here, how a life of holiness and virtue, which is the best and only preparation for death, tends to make us happy in this world, delivers us from all those mischiefs which the wildness and giddiness of youth, and the more confirmed debaucheries of riper years expose men to ; for this is properly the condemnation of virtue, not of an early preparation of death : and yet this is really a great engagement and motive to prepare betimes for death, since such a preparation for death will put us to no greater hardships and inconveniencies, than the practice of such virtues, as will prolong our lives, preserve our increase, our fortunes, give us honor and reputation in the world, and make us beloved both by God and men. But setting aside these things, there are two advantages of an early preparation for death, which contribute more to our happiness, than all the world besides. 1. That it betimes delivers us from the fears of death, and consequently from most other fears. 2ly. That it supports us under all the troubles and calamities of this life.

1. It betimes delivers us from the fears of death and indeed it is then only a man begins to live, when he is got above the fears of death. Were men thoughtful and considerate, death would hang over them in all their mirth and jollity, like a fatal sword by a single hair ; it would sour all their enjoyments, and strike terror into their hearts and looks : but the security of most men is, that they put off the thoughts of death, as they do their preparation for it : they live secure and free from danger, only because they will not open their eyes to see it. But these are such examples as no wise man will propose to himself, because they are not safe : and there are so many occasions to put these men in mind of death, that it is a very hard thing not to think of it, and whenever they do, it chills their blood and spirits, and draws a black and melancholy veil over all the glories of the world. How are such men surprised, when any danger approaches ? when death comes within view, and shews his scythe, and only some few sands at the bottom of the glass ? This is a very frightful sight to men who are not prepared to die ; and yet should they give themselves liberty to think, in what danger they live every minute, how many thousand accidents may cut them off, which they can neither foresee nor prevent ; fear, and horror, and consternation would be their constant entertainment, till they could think of death without fear ; till they were reconciled to the thoughts of dying, by great and certain hopes of a better life after death.

So that no man can live happily, if he lives like a man, with his thoughts, and reason, and consideration about him, but he who takes care betimes to prepare for death and another world : till this be done, a wise man will see himself always in danger, and then he must always fear : but he is a happy man who knows and considers himself to be mortal, and is not afraid to die : his pleasures and enjoyments are sincere and unmixt, never disturbed with a hand writing upon the wall, nor with some secret qualms and misgivings of mind ; he is not terrified with present dangers, at least not amazed and distracted with them. A man who is delivered from the fears of death, fears nothing else in excess, but God : and fear is so troublesome a passion, that nothing is more for the happiness of our lives, than to be delivered from it.

2. As a consequent of this, an early preparation for death will support men under all the troubles and calamities of this life : there are so many troubles, which mankind are exposed to in this world, that no man must expect to escape them all ; nay, there are a great many troubles, which are insupportable to human nature, which there can be no relief for in this world : the hopes and expectations of a better life are, in most cases, the safest retreat ; a man may bear his present sufferings with some courage, when he knows that he shall quickly see an end to them, that death will put an end to them, and place him out of their reach : For there the wicked cease from troubling, and there the weary be at rest ; there the prisoners rest together, they hear not the voice of the oppressor ; the small and great are there, and the servant is free from his master, Job. iii. 17, 18, 19.

So that in many cases the thoughts and expectations of death, are the only things, that can support us under present sufferings ; but while the thoughts of death itself are terrible to us, this will be a poor comfort : men who are under the sense of guilt, are more afraid of death, than they are of all the evils of this world : whatever their present sufferings are, they are not so terrible as lakes of fire and brimstone, the worm that never dieth, and the fire that never goeth out. So that such men, while they are under the fears and terrors of death, have nothing to support them under present miseries. The next world, which death puts us into the possession of, is a very delightful prospect to good men ; there they see the rewards of their labors and sufferings, of their faith and patience : they can suffer shame and reproach, and take joyfully the spoiling of their goods ; since these light afflictions, which are but for a season, will work for them a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. But men who are not prepared to die, while they are afraid of death, can find no relief against the sufferings of it : the sooner we prepare to die, the sooner we are delivered from the fears of death, and then the hope of a better life will carry us cheerfully through this world whatever storms we meet with.

3dly, Since we must certainly die, it makes it extremely reasonable to sacrifice our lives to God, whenever he calls for them ; that is, rather to choose to die a little before our time, than to renounce God, or to give his worship to idols, or any created beings, or to corrupt the faith and religion of Christ : there are arguments indeed enough to encourage christians to martyrdom, when God calls them to suffer for his sake : the love of Christ in dying for us, is a sufficient reason why we should cheerfully die for him ; and the great rewards of martyrdom, that glorious crown which is reserved for such conquerors, made the primitive christians ambitious of it : it is certain there is no hurt in it ; nay, that it is a peculiar favor to die for Christ, because those persons who were most dear to him were crowned with martyrdom : But our present argument shews us, at what an easy rate we may purchase so glorious a crown ; for we part with nothing for it : we die for God, and we must die whether we die martyrs or not : and what man then who knows he must die, and believes the rewards of martyrdom, can think it so terrible to die a martyr ? No good christian can think that he loses any thing by the bargain, to exchange this life for a better : for as many years as he goes sooner out of this world, than he should have done by the course of nature, so many years he gets sooner to heaven ; and I suppose that is no great loss : It is indeed a noble expression of our love to God, and of our entire obedience and subjection to him, and of a perfect trust in him, to part with our lives for his sake ; but what can a man, who knows he must die, do less for God than this ; than to part with a life which he cannot keep, than willingly to lay down a life for God, which will shortly be taken from him, whether he will or not.

4thly, This shews us also, what little reason we have to be afraid of the power of men ; the utmost they can do, is to kill the body ; a mortal body which will die whether they kill it or not : which is no mighty argument of power, no more than it is to break a brittle glass ; nor any great hurt to us, no more than it is to die, which we are all born to, and which is no injury to a good man : and therefore our Savior's counsel is very remarkable, Luke, xii. 4, 5. Be not afraid of them who kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do : But I will forewarn you, whom you shall fear, fear him, which after he hath killed, hath power to cast into hell ; yea, I say unto you, fear him.

This is very reasonable, when the fear of God and men is opposed to each other, which is the only case our Savior supposes. No man ought foolishly to fling away his life, nor to provoke and affront princes, who have the power of life and death : this is not to die like a martyr, but like a fool, or a rebel. But when a prince threatens death, and God threatens damnation, then our Savior's counsel takes place, not to fear men but God : for indeed God's power in this is equal to men's at least ; men can kill, for men are mortal, and may be killed ; and this is only for a mortal creature to die a little out of order : but God can kill too ; and thus far the case is the same. It is true, most men are of the mind, in such a case, rather to trust God than men, because he does not always punish in this world, nor execute a speedy vengeance. And yet when our Savior takes notice, that God kills as well as men, it seems to intimate to us, that such apostates, who rather choose to provoke God than men, may meet with their deserts in this world : for no man is secure that God will not punish him in this world ; and apostates, of all others, have least reason to expect it. Those who renounce God for fear of men, are the fittest persons to be made examples of a sudden vengeance. But then when men have killed the body, they can do no more, they cannot kill the soul ; and here the power of God and men is very unequal, for when he has killed, he can cast both body and soul into hell-fire : this is a very formidable power indeed, and we have reason to fear him ; but the power of men, who can only kill a mortal body, is not very terrible ; it ought not to fright us into any sin, which will make us obnoxious to that more terrible power, which can destroy the soul.

CHAP. III.

Concerning the time of our death, and the proper improvement of it.

LET us now consider the time of our death, which is once, but when, uncertain.

Now when I say the time of our death is uncertain, I need not tell you that I mean only it is uncertain to us ; that is, that no man knows when he shall die ; for God certainly knows when we shall die, because he knows all things, and therefore, with respect to the fore-knowledge of God, the time of our death is certain.

Thus much is certain as to death, that we must all die ; and it is certain also, that death is not far off, because we know our lives are very short. Before the flood men lived many hundred years ; but it is a great while now since the Psalmist observed, that the ordinary term of human life had very narrow bounds set to it, The days of our years are three score years and ten ; and if by reason of strength they be four score years, yet is their strength, labor and sorrow : for it is soon cut off, and we flie away, Psal. xc. 10. There are some exceptions from this general rule, but this is the ordinary period of human life, when it is spun out to the greatest length ; and therefore within this term we may reasonably expect it ; for in the ordinary course of nature our bodies are not made to last much longer.

Thus far we are certain ; but then how much of this time we shall run out, how soon, or how late we shall die, we know not, for we see no age exempted from death ; some expire in the cradle, and at their mother's breasts, others in the heat and vigor of youth, others survive to a decrepit age, and it may be follow their whole family to their graves. Death very often surpriseth us, when we least think of it, without giving us any warning of its approach ; and that is proof enough, that the time of our death is unknown and uncertain to us.

But these things deserve to be particularly discoursed ; and therefore with reference to the time of our death, I shall observe these four things, not so much to explain them ; for most of them are plain enough of themselves, as to improve them for the government of our lives :

- I. That the general period of human life, which is the same thing with the time of our death, is fixed and determined by God.
- II. That the particular time of every man's death, though it be foreknown by God, who foreknows all things, yet it does not appear, that it is peremptorily decreed and determined by God.
- III. That the particular time, when any of us shall die, is unknown and uncertain to us.
- IV. That we must die but once ; It is appointed for all men once to die.

SECT. I. That the general period of human life is fixed and determined by God, and that it is but very short.

I. That the general period of human life, which is the same thing with the time of our death, is fixed and determined by God : that is, there is a time set to human life, beyond which no man shall live, as Job speaks : Job. xiv. 5. His days are determined, the number of his months are with thee, thou hast appointed his bounds that he cannot pass. Which does not refer to the period of every particular man's life, but is spoken of men in general, that there are fixed bounds set to human life, which no man can exceed.

What these bounds are, God has not expressly declared, but that must be learnt from observation : such a time as most commonly puts a period to men's lives, who live longest, may generally pass for the common measure of human life, though there may be some few exceptions.

Before the flood, no man lived a thousand years, and therefore we may conclude, that the longest term of human life, after the sentence of death was passed on man, was confined within a thousand years. Methuselah, who was the longest liver, lived but nine hundred and sixty-nine years, and he died ; so that no man ever lived a thousand years : and comparing this observation with that promise of a thousand year's reign with Christ, which is called the first resurrection, and is the portion only of martyrs and confessors, and pure and sincere christians. Rev. xx. ; I have been apt to conclude, that to live a thousand years, is the privilege only of immortal creatures ; that if Adam had continued innocent, he should have lived no longer on earth, but have been translated to heaven without dying ; for this thousand year's reign of the Saints with Christ, whatever that signifies, seems to be intended as a reparation of that death which they fell under by Adam's sin : but then these thousand years do not put an end to the happiness of these glorious Saints, but they are immortal creatures, and though this reign with Christ continues but a thousand years, their happiness shall have no end, though the scene may change and vary ; for over such men the second death hath no power : Or else this thousand years' reign with Christ must signify an eternal and unchangeable kingdom, a thousand years being a certain earnest of immortality ; but there is an unanswerable objection against that, because we read of the expiring of these thousand years, and what shall come after them, even the final judgement of all the world. But this is a great mystery, which we must not hope perfectly to understand, till we see the blessed accomplishment of it.

But though before the flood some persons lived very near the thousand years, yet after the flood the term of this life was much shortened : some think this was done by God, when he pronounced that sentence, Gen. vi. 3. And the Lord said, my Spirit shall not always strive with man, for that he also is flesh, yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years. As if God had then decreed, that the life of man should not exceed an hundred and twenty years ; but this does not agree with that account we have of men's lives after the flood ; for not only Noah and his sons, who were with him in the ark, lived much longer than this after the flood : but Arphaxad lived five hundred and thirty years, Salah four hundred and three years, Eber four hundred and thirty years, and Abraham himself a hundred and seventy-five years ; and therefore this hundred and twenty years cannot refer to the ordinary term of man's life, but to the continuance of God's patience with that wicked world, before he would bring the flood upon them to destroy that corrupt generation of men ; that is, that he would bear with them a hundred and twenty years, before he would send the flood to destroy them. But afterwards by degrees life was shortened, inso-much that though Moses himself lived a great deal longer, yet if the ninetyeth Psalm were composed by him, as the title tells us it was, the ordinary term of life in his days, was but three score and ten, or four score years, ver. 10. The days of our years are three score years and ten ; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labor and sorrow ; so soon passeth it away, and it is gone. And this has continued the ordinary measure of life ever since ; which is so very short, that David might well say, Behold, thou hast made my days as an hands-breadth, and mine age is as nothing before thee : verily, verily, every man at his best estate is altogether vanity, Psal. xxxix. 5.

I shall not scrupulously inquire into the reason of this great change, why our lives are reduced into so narrow a compass : some will not believe that it was so, but think that there is a mistake in the manner of the account ; that when they are said to live eight or nine hundred years, they computed their years by the moon, not by the sun ; that is, their years were months, twelve of which make but one of our years ; and then indeed the longest livers of them did not live so long as many men do at this day ; for Methusalah himself, who lived nine hundred sixty-nine years, according to this computation of months for years, lived but fourscore years and five months. But it is very absurd to imagine, that Moses should use two such different accounts of time, that sometimes by a year he should mean no more than a month, and sometimes twelve months, without giving the least notice of it, which is unpardonable in any historian : and therefore others complain much that they were not born in those days, when the life of man was prolonged for so many hundred years : there had been some comfort in living then, when they enjoyed all the vigor and gaiety of youth, and could relish the pleasure of life for seven, eight or nine hundred years. A blessing which men would purchase at any rate in our days : but now we can scarce turn ourselves about in the world, but we are admonished by grey hairs, or the sensible decays of nature, to prepare for our winding sheet. And therefore, for the farther improvement of this argument, I shall, 1. shew you, what little reason we have to complain of the shortness of life. 2. What wise use we are to make of it.

SECT. II. What little reason we have to complain of the shortness of human life.

I. WHAT little reason we have to complain of the shortness of life, and the too hasty approaches of death to us : for 1. Such a long life is not reconcileable with the present state of the world. And, 2dly, our lives are long enough for all the wise purposes of living.

1. Such a long life is not reconcileable with the present state of the world. What the state of the world was before the flood, in what manner they lived, and how they employed their time, we cannot tell, for Moses has given no account of it ; but taking the world as it is, and as we find it, I dare undertake to convince those men who are most apt to complain of the shortness of life, that it would not be for the general happiness of mankind, to have it much longer : for, 1. The world is at present very unequally divided ; some have a large share and portion of it, others have nothing, but what they earn by very hard labor, or extort from other men's charity by their restless importunities, or gain by more ungodly arts : Now, though the rich and prosperous, who have the world at command, and live in ease and pleasure, would be very well contented to spend some hundred years in this world, yet I should think, fifty or three score years abundantly enough for slaves and beggars : enough to spend in hunger and want, in a jail and a prison. And those who are so foolish as not to think this enough, owe a great deal to the wisdom and goodness of God, that he does : so that the greatest part of mankind have great reason to be contented with the shortness of life, because they have no temptation to wish it longer.

2ly, The present state of this world requires a more quick succession : the world is pretty well peopled, and is divided among its present inhabitants ; and but very few, in comparison, as I observed before, have any considerable share in the division : now let us but suppose, that all our ancestors, who lived one or two hundred years ago, were alive still, and possessed their old estates and honors, what had become of this present generation of men, who have now taken their places, and make as great a show and bustle in the world as they did ? And if you look back three, or four, or five hundred years, the case is still so much the worse ; the world would be over peopled, and where there is one poor miserable man now, there must have been five hundred, or the world must have been common, and all men reduced to the same level ; which I believe the rich and happy people, who are so fond of long life, would not like very well. This would utterly undo our young prodigal heirs, were their hopes of succession three or four hundred years off, who, as short as life is now, think their fathers make very little haste to their graves : this would spoil their trade of spending their estates before they have them, and make them live a dull sober life, whether they would or no ; and such a life, I know, they don't think worth having : and therefore, I hope, at least they will not make the shortness of their fathers' lives an argument against providence ; and yet such kind of sparks as these, are commonly the wits that set up for atheism, and, when it is put into their heads, quarrel with every thing which they fondly conceive will weaken the belief of a God, and a providence, and among other things, with the shortness of life, which they have little reason to do, when they so often out-live their estates.

3ly, The world is very bad as it is, so bad, that good men scarce know how to spend fifty or three score years, in it ; but consider how bad it would probably be, were the life of man extended to six, seven, or eight hundred years. If so near a prospect of the other world, as forty or fifty years, cannot restrain men from the greatest villanies what would they do, if they could as reasonably suppose death to be three or four hundred years off ? If men make such improvements in wickedness in twenty or thirty years, what would they do in hundreds ? and what a blessed place then would this world be to live in ? We see in the old world, when the life of man was drawn out so great a length, the wickedness of mankind grew so insufferable, that it repented God he had made man, and he resolved to destroy that whole generation excepting Noah and his family : and the most probable account that can be given, how they came to grow so universally wicked, is the long and prosperous lives of such wicked men, who by degrees corrupted others, and they others, till there was but one righteous family left, and no other remedy left, but to destroy them all, leaving only that righteous family as the seed and future hopes of the new world.

And when God had determined in himself, and promised to Noah, never to destroy the world again by such an universal destruction, till the last and final judgement, it was necessary by degrees to shorten the lives of men, which was the most effectual means to make them more governable, and to remove bad examples out of the world ; which would hinder the spreading of the infection, and people, and reform the world by new examples of piety and virtue : for when there are quick successions of men, there are few ages but have some great and brave examples, which give a new and better spirit to the world.

Many other things might be added, to convince those who complain of the shortness of human life, that it would be no desirable thing, as the state of the world now is, to live seven or eight hundred years in it ; but this I suppose is enough, if I can make good the second thing I proposed, that our lives are long enough for all the wise purposes of living.

Now I will not promise myself to satisfy all men in this matter ; for those who think it the only end of living, to eat and drink, and enjoy the more impure delights of flesh and sense, will never be satisfied, that three score and ten years are as good as eight or nine hundred for this purpose ; for the longer they enjoy these pleasures, and the oftener they repeat them, the better it is : but these men ought to be convinced, that this is not the true end of living, that these are only means to preserve life, which God has sweetened with such proper satisfactions, or made the neglect of them so uneasy and painful, that no man might forget to take care to preserve himself ; but man was made at first for higher and nobler ends, and since by the sin of Adam we are all become mortal, this life is not for itself, but in order to a better life.

We come into this world, not to stay here, or to take up our abode and rest, for then indeed the longer we lived the better ; but this world is only a state of trial and discipline, to exercise our virtues, to perfect our minds, to prepare and qualify ourselves for the more pure and refined and spiritual enjoyments of the other world. We come into this world, not so much to enjoy, as to conquer it, and to triumph over it, to baffle its temptations, to despise its flatteries, and to endure its terrors ; and if we live long enough to do this, we live long enough, and ought to thank God, that our work, and labor, and temptations are at an end : for what laboring man is not glad that his work is over, and that he may go to rest ? What mariner is not glad that he has weathered all storms, and steered a safe course to his desired haven.

There are two things necessary to the improvement of our minds, knowledge and virtue : and as God has shortened our lives, so he has shortened our work too, and given us a more easy and compendious way to both.

Knowledge indeed is an infinite and endless thing, and it is impossible thoroughly to satisfy that appetite in great and generous minds, in this blind and obscure state of life ; but the comfort is, all the knowledge that is necessary to carry us to heaven, is now plain and easy, and will not take up many years to learn it, for, this is life eternal to know God, and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent ; which is plainly revealed to us in the gospel : and when we get to heaven, we shall quickly understand all the difficulties of nature and providence in another manner, than the greatest philosophers do now, or can do, though they should live many hundred years.

And as for virtue, we have as short and easy a way to it : the plainest and most perfect precepts, the most admirable examples, the most encouraging and inviting promises, and which is more than all, the most powerful assistances of the divine spirit to renew and sanctify us ; and he who is not reformed by these divine and supernatural methods of grace, in forty or fifty years, is not likely to be the better for them, though he should live to Methuselah's age.

As for doing good, I confess, the longer a good man lives, the more good he will do, and make himself the more useful to the world ; but this is God's care, and whenever he calls him out of the world, he excuses him from doing any more good in it.

The truth is, nothing could be more improper under the state of the gospel, than such a long life, as worldly men are very fond of ; for our Savior has taught us to expect persecutions and sufferings for his name ; and this is very often the portion of true and sincere christians, that St. Paul could say, If in this life only we had hope, we were of all men the most miserable. Thanks be to God, it is not always so, but when it is, it would be too great a temptation for human nature, to live some hundred years in a state of persecution, as they might, if they and the persecuting prince should live so long.

Nay, such a long life as men talk of, would greatly weaken the promises and threatenings of the gospel, which are all absent and unseen things, to be expected in the other world ; but if the next world were so many hundred years off, both the promises and threatenings of it, would lose their effect upon the generality of mankind.

Nay, it might be thought very hard upon good men, who are taught by the gospel of Christ to live above this world, and to have a very mean opinion of, and a great indifferency to all the delights of it, to live so many hundred years in it, not so much to enjoy it, as to despise it, and to contend with it. And it is not less hard for men, who are transported with the ravishing hopes and expectations of a better life, whose hearts and conversations are already in heaven to be kept so long out of it : this is a severe trial of their patience ; for hope, when it is so long delayed, is a very troublesome and uneasy passion ; and though few men long to die, yet a great many good men do very impatiently long to be in heaven, and can be contented, whenever God pleases, to submit to dying, though with some natural reluctancy, that they may get to heaven.

In short, this life is long enough for a race, for a warfare, for a pilgrimage ; it is long enough to fight and contend with this world, and all the temptations of it ; it is long enough to know this world, to discover the vanity of it, and to live above it ; it is long enough, by the grace of God, to purge and refine our minds, and to prepare ourselves to live for ever in God's presence ; and when we are in any measure prepared for heaven, and possessed with great and passionate desires of it, we shall think it a great deal too long to be kept out of it.

SECT. III. What use to make of the fixed term of human life.

2. LET us consider what wise use is to be made of this ; and here are two things distinctly to be considered : 1. That the general term of human life is fixed and determined by God. 2. That this common term and period of life, at the utmost extent of it, is but very short.

1. That the general term of human life is fixed and determined by God ; and this is capable of very wise improvements : For,

1. When we know that we cannot live above three score or four score years, or some few years over or under, we should not extend our hopes and expectations and designs beyond this term. 2. We should frequently count our days and observe how our lives waste, and draw near to eternity. 3. When this period draws nigh, and death comes within view, it more especially concerns us to apply ourselves to a more serious and solemn preparation for death.

1. We should not extend our hopes and expectations and designs beyond this term, which God has fixed for the conclusion of our lives : we should not live as if we were immortal creatures, who are never to die ; for if God have set bounds to our lives, it is absurd for us to expect to live any longer, unless we hope to alter the decrees of heaven.

And yet it is more absurd, if it be possible, to extend our hopes and desires, our projects and designs for this world, beyond the term of our living here ; for how unreasonable is it for us to trouble ourselves about this world longer than we are like to continue in it ! and yet if this were observed, it would ease us of a great deal of labor and care, and deliver the world from those great troubles and disorders, which the designs and projects for future age create.

Men might see some end of their labors, and of their cares, of encreasing riches, and adding house to house, and field to field, did they stint their desires with their lives ; did they consider how long they were to live, and what is a sufficient and necessary provision for their continuance here : whereas now the generality of mankind drudge on to the last moment they have to live, and still heap up riches till they know no end of them, as if their lives and their enjoyment of them, were to have no end-neither.

The only tolerable excuse that can be made for this, is the care of posterity, to leave a liberal provision for children, that they may live happily after us : but this indeed is rather an excuse than a reason, for thus we see it is, when there is no such reason for it ; when men have no children to provide for, nor it may be any relations, for whom they are much concerned ; or when they have a sufficient provision for all their children, to encourage their industry and virtue, though not to maintain them in idleness and vice, which no wise and good father would desire ; nay, it may be, when they have no other heir to an overgrown estate, but either a daughter, whose fortune may make her a rich prey, as is too often seen ; or a prodigal son, who is ruined already by the expectation of so great a fortune, and will quickly be even with his fortune, and ruin that when he has it.

A competent provision for children, is a just reason to continue our industry, though we have enough for ourselves, as long as we live, but to make them rich and great, is not. The piety and charity of parents, which entails a blessing upon their posterity, and an industrious and virtuous education of children, is a better inheritance for them than a great estate. But men, who are so intent to the very last upon encreasing their estates, seldom do it for any other reason, but to satisfy their own insatiable thirst, which is to hoard up riches for a time when they cannot enjoy them, to provide for their living in this world a much longer time, than they know they can possibly live in it. This is much greater folly than the man in the parable was guilty of, whose ground brought forth plentifully, and he pulled down his barns, and built greater, and said to his soul, soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years, take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry. He was so wise as to know when he had enough, and when it was fit to retire and take his ease : yet God said unto him, Thou fool, this night shall thy soul be required of thee ; and then whose shall all these things be, which thou hast provided ? Luke. xii. 10, &c.

Thus how big are most men with projects and designs, which there is little hope should ever take effect, while they live ? especially aspiring monarchs, and busy politicians, who draw the scheme, and frame their design of an universal empire, through a long series of events, or meditate changes and alterations of government, of the laws and religion of a nation, by insensible steps and methods ; which, though it were never so hopeful a project, they cannot hope to live to see effected, and therefore exceed their own bounds, and trouble the world at present, with what no body now living may ever be concerned in ; they undertake to govern the world, when they are dead and gone, whereas every age brings forth new projects and counsels, as it does a new generation of men, and new scenes of affairs, and a new set of politicians : would men but confine their cares and projects within the bounds of their own lives, and mind only what concerns themselves, and their own times, and they would live more at ease, and the world enjoy more peace and quiet, than now it is ever likely to do : and yet one would think this very reasonable, not to concern ourselves about the world any longer than we are like to live in it ; to do no injury to posterity as near as we can, and to do what good we can for them, without disturbing the present peace and good government of the world, but to leave the care of the next age to those who shall succeed, and to that good providence which governs and takes care of all ages and generations of men.

2. Since we know the common period of human life, we should frequently count our days, and observe how our lives waste, and draw near to eternity. Our time slides away insensibly, and few men take notice how it goes; they find their strength and vigor continues without any decay; and they reckon upon living three score and ten, or four score years, but seldom consider that it may be thirty or forty years are already gone, that is, the best half of their lives; they put a cheat upon themselves by computing the whole duration of their lives, without considering how much of this is already past, and how little of it is come; which if men would seriously think of, they would not be so apt to flatter themselves with a long life; for no man accounts twenty or thirty years a long life, and that is the most they have to live now, though they should attain to the longest period of human life, much less could they flatter themselves with a long life, when they could not probably reckon above fifteen or ten years to come. And would men observe how their life shortens every day, this, if any thing, would make them grow chary of their time, and begin to think of living, that is, of minding the true ends and purposes of life, of doing the work for which they came into the world, and which they must do before they die, or they are miserable for ever.

3. When men draw near the end of their reckoning ; nay, it may be, are past the common reckoning of mankind, it more especially concerns them to apply themselves to a more serious and solemn preparation for death : for how vigorous soever their age is, death cannot be far off ; it will be unpardonable in them, to be deceived with the hopes of living much longer, who have already attained to the common period of human life, and are in the borders and confines, nay in the very quarters of death, and have already, if I may so speak, borrowed some years from the other world.

Now when I speak of such men's preparing for death, I do not mean, that they should then begin to think of dying ; that is a great deal too late to begin such a work ; though if they have not done it before, it is without doubt high time to begin it then, in the last minute of their lives, and to do what they can in that little time that remains, to obtain their pardon of God for spending a long life in sin and vanity, and in a forgetfulness of their Maker and Redeemer.

But that which I now intend, concerns those who have thought of dying long before, and governed their lives under the conduct and influence of such thoughts, and therefore are not wholly unprepared for death, but are ready to welcome it, whenever it comes ; but there is a decent way of meeting death, which becomes such men, which I call a more solemn preparation for it ; that is, when their condition and circumstances of life will permit it, to take a timely leave of the world, and to withdraw from the noise and business of it ; when they are placed just in the confines of both worlds, to direct their face wholly to that world whither they are going, to spend the little remains of their lives in conversing with themselves, with God, and with the other world.

1. In conversing with themselves, which God knows very few men do, while they are engaged in the business of this world ; the cares of life, or the pleasures of it, our families, or our friends, or strangers themselves, take us from ourselves ; and therefore it is fit, before men go out of this world, that they should recover the possession of themselves, and grow a little more acquainted and intimate with themselves ; that they should retire from the world to take a more thorough review of their lives and actions, what they have still to do, to make their peace with God and their own consciences ; whether there be any sin which they have not thoroughly repented of, and heartily begged God's pardon for it, or an injury they have done their neighbor, for which they have not made sufficient restitution and reparation ;

whether they have any quarrel with any man, which is not composed and reconciled : whether there is any part of their duty, which they have formerly too much neglected, as charity to the poor, the wise education and instruction of their children and families, and to apply themselves to a more diligent discharge of it ; what distempers there are in their minds, which still need to be rectified, what graces are weakest, what passions are most disorderly and unmortified, and to apply proper remedies to them.

This is an excellent preparation for death, because it will give us great hope and assurance in dying ; it gives us peace and satisfaction in our own minds, by a thorough knowledge of our own state, and by rectifying whatever was amiss ; it delivers our consciences from guilty fears, and so disarms death of its sting and terrors, for the sting of death is sin, and when this sting is pulled out, we have nothing else to contend with, but some little natural aversions to dying, which are more easily conquered.

2. Thus in this preparatory retirement from the world, we should spend great portions of our time in the worship of God, in our public or private devotions ; for commonly men of business are very much in arrears with God upon this account : in their active age they had little time to spare, or little mind to spare it for the uses of religion ; and therefore we may well retire some time before we die, to make up that defect, and when we have done with the world, to give up ourselves wholly to the service of God : we should now be very importunate in our prayers to God, that for the merits and intercession of Christ, he would freely pardon all the sins, and frailties, and errors of our past life, and give us such a comfortable hope and sense of his love to us, as may support us in the hour of death, and sweeten the terrors and agonies of it : we should meditate on the great love of God in sending Christ into the world to save sinners ; and contemplate the height and depth and length and breadth of that love of God, which passeth all human understanding : we should represent to ourselves the wonderful condescension of the Son of God in becoming man, his amazing goodness in dying for sinners, the just for the unjust, to reconcile us to God : and when we have warmed our souls with such thoughts as these, we should break forth into raptures and extasies of devotion in the praise of our Maker and Redeemer : worthy is the Lamb that was slain, to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing. Blessing, and honor, and glory and power be unto him that sitteth on the throne, and to the Lamb for ever and ever, Revel. v. 12, 13.

And besides other reasons, which make this a very proper preparation for death, this accustoms us to the work and employment of the next world, for heaven is a life of devotion and praise ; there we shall see God and admire and adore him, and sing eternal hallelujahs to him : and therefore nothing can so dispose and prepare us for heaven, as to have our hearts ready tuned to the praise of God, ravished with his love, transported with his glory and perfections, and swallowed up in the most profound and humble adorations of him.

3. Thus when we are going into another world, it becomes us most to have our thoughts there ; to consider what a blessed place that is, where we shall be delivered from all the fears and sorrows and temptations of this world, where we shall see God and the blessed Jesus, and converse with angels and glorified spirits, and live an endless life without fear of dying ; where there is nothing but perfect love and peace, no cross interests and factions to contend with, no storms to ruffle or discompose our joy and rest to eternity ; where there is no pain, no sickness, no labor, no care to refresh the weariness, or to repair the decays of a mortal body, not so much as the image of death to interrupt our constant enjoyments ; where there is a perpetual day, and an eternal calm, where our souls shall attain their utmost perfection of knowledge and virtue ; where we shall serve God not with dull, and sleepy, and unaffecting devotions, but with piercing thoughts, with life and vigor, with ravishment and transport ; in a word, where there are such things, as neither eye hath seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive.

These are proper thoughts for a man who is to compose himself for death, when he shall be wrapt up in his winding-sheet ; not to think of the dark and melancholy retirements of the grave, where his body must rot and putrify, till it be raised up again immortal and glorious, but to lift up his eyes to heaven, to view that lightsome and happy country, with Moses to ascend up into the mount, and take a prospect of the heavenly Canaan, whither he is going. This will conquer even the natural aversions to death, and make us, with St. Paul, desirous to be dissolved, and to be with Christ, which is best of all ; make it as easy to us to leave this world for heaven, as it is to remove into a more pleasant and wholesome air, or into a more convenient and beautiful house ; so easy, so pleasant will it be to die with such thoughts as these about us.

This indeed ought to be the constant exercise of the christian life ; it is fit for all times and for all persons, and without some degree of it, it is impossible to conquer the temptations of the world, or to live in the practice of divine and heavenly virtues : but this ought to be the constant business, or entertainment rather, of those happy men who have lived long enough in the world, to take a fair leave of it, who have run through all the scenes and stages of human life, and have now death and another world in view and prospect.

And it is this makes a retirement from the world so necessary or so very useful, not merely to ease our bodily labors, and to get a little rest from business, to dissolve in sloth and idleness, or to wander about to seek a companion, or to hear news, or to talk politics, or to find out some way to spend time, which now lies upon our hands, and is more uneasy and troublesome to us than business was : this is a more dangerous state, and does more indispose us for a happy death, than all the cares and troubles of an active life ; but we must retire from this world to have more leisure and greater opportunities to prepare for the next, to adorn and cultivate our minds, and dress our souls like a bride, who is adorned to meet her bridegroom.

When men converse much in this world, and are distracted with the cares and business of it, when they live in a croud of customers or clients, and are hurried from their shops to the Exchange or Custom-house, or from their chambers to the bar, and when they have discharged one obligation, are pressed hard by another, that at night they have hardly spirits left to say their prayers, nor any time for them in the morning, and the Lord's day itself is thought more proper for rest and refreshment, than devotion ; I say, what dull cold apprehensions must such men have of another world ? And after all the care we can take, how will this world insinuate itself into our affections, when it employs our time and thoughts, when our whole business is buying and selling, and driving good bargains, and making conveyances and settlements of estates ? How will this disorder our passions, occasion feuds and quarrels, give us a tincture of pride, ambition, covetousness ; that there is work enough after a busy life, even for very good men, to wash out these stains and pollutions, and to get the taste and relish of this world out of their mouths, and to revive and quicken the sense of God and of another world.

This is a sufficient reason for such men, as I observed before, to think when it is time to leave off, and if not wholly to withdraw from the world, yet to contract their business, and to have the command of it, that they may have more leisure to take care of their souls, before they have so near a call and summons to death ; but much more necessary is it, when death is even at the door, and by the course of nature we know that it is so.

It is very proper to leave the world, before we are removed out of it, that we may know how to live without it ; that we may not carry any hankerings after this world with us into the next ; and therefore it is very fitting that there should be a kind of middle state between this world and the next ; that is, that we should withdraw from this world, to wean ourselves from it, even while we are in it ; which will make it more easy to part with this world, and make us more fit to go to the next. But it seems strangely indecent, unless the necessities of their families, or the necessities of the public call for it, and exact it, to see men who are just a going out of the world, who it may be bow as much under their riches, as under their age, plunging themselves over head and ears in this world, courting new honors and preferments with as much zeal, as those who are but entering into the world. It is to be feared, such men think very little of another world, and will never be satisfied with earth, till they are buried in it.

SECT. IV. What use to make of the shortness of human life.

2. AS the general period of human life is fixed and determined by God, so this term of life at the utmost extent of it, is but very short : for what are three score and ten, or four score years ? How soon do they pass away like a dream, and when they are gone, how few and empty do they appear ? The best way to be sensible of this, is not to look forward, for we fancy time to come, to be much longer than we find it, but to look backward upon the time which is past, and as long as we can remember ; and how suddenly are thirty or forty years gone ? How little do we remember, how they past ? But gone they are, and the rest are going a pace, while we eat, and drink, and sleep ; and when they are gone too, we shall be sensible, that all together was but very short.

Now from hence I shall observe several things of very great use for the government of our lives.

1. If our lives be so very short, it concerns us to lose none of our time ; for does it become us to be prodigal of our time, when we have so little of it ? We either ought to make as much of our lives as we can, or not complain that they are short, for that is a greater reproach to ourselves, than to the order of nature, and the providence of God : for it seems we have more time than we care to live in, more than we think necessary to improve to the true ends and purposes of living ; and if we can spare so much of our lives, it seems they are too long for us, how short soever they are in themselves : and when our lives are too long already for the generality of mankind to improve wisely, why should God give us more time to play with, and to squander away ? And yet let us all reflect upon ourselves and consider, how much of our lives we have perfectly lost, how careless we have been of our time, which is the most precious thing in the world ; how we have given it to every body that will take it, and given away so much of ourselves, and of our own being with it.

Should men sit down, and take a review of their lives, and draw up a particular account of the expence of their time, after they came to years of discretion and understanding, what a shameful bill would it be ? What unreasonable abatements of life ?

How little time would there be at the foot of the account, which might be called living ?

So much extraordinary for eating, and drinking, and sleeping, beyond what the support and refreshment of nature required ; so much in courtship, wantonness, and lust ; so much in drinking and revelling ; so much for the recovery of the last nights debauch ; so much in gaming and masquerades ; so much in paying and receiving formal and impertinent visits, in idle and extravagant discourses, in censuring and reviling our neighbors or our governors ; so much in dressing and adorning our bodies ; so many blank and long parentheses of life, wasted in doing nothing, or in counting the slow and tedious minutes, or chiding the sun for making no more haste down, and delaying their evening assignations ; but how little would there appear in most men's account, spent to the true ends of living ?

The very naming of these things is sufficient to convince any considering man, that this is really a misspending of time, and a flinging away great part of a very short life to no purpose ; but to make you all sensible of this, consider with me, when we may be said to lose our time ; for time passes away very swiftly, and we can no more hold it, than we can stop the chariot wheels of the sun ; but all time that is past, is not lost ; indeed no time is our own, but what is past or present, and its being past makes it nevertheless our own, if ever it were so ; but then we lose our time.

1. When it turns to no account to us, when it is gone ; when we are never the better for it in body or soul : this is the true way of judging, by our own sense and feeling, whether we have spent our time well or ill, by observing what relish it leaves upon our minds, and what the effects of it are, when it is past : how vainly soever men spend their time, they find some pleasure and diversion and entertainments in it, while it lasts, but the next morning it is all vanished, as their night dreams are ; and if they are not the worse for it, they find themselves never the better : and this is a certain sign, that our time was vainly and foolishly spent, that when it is gone, it can be brought into no account of our lives, but that of idle expences. Whatever is good, whatever is in any degree useful, leaves some satisfaction when it is gone, and time so spent we can place to our account, and all such time is not lost ; but men who spend one day after another in mirth and jollity, and entertainments, in visits or gaming, &c. can give no other account of it, but that it is a pleasant way of spending time : and that is the true name for it, not living but spending time, which they know not how otherwise to pass away ; when their time is spent, they have all they intended, and their enjoyments pass away with their time, and there is an end of both ; and it were somewhat more tolerable, if they could end with their time too : but when men must out-live time, and the effects of time must last to eternity, that time, which if it have no ill, yet has no good effects more lasting than itself, is utterly lost.

2ly, To be sure that time is doubly lost, which we cannot review without amazement and horror ; I mean, in which we have contracted some great guilt, which we have not only spent vainly, but wickedly, which we ourselves wish had never been, which we desire to forget, and could be glad, that both God and men would forget it too : for is not that lost time, which loses us, which undoes us, which distracts us with guilty fears, which we would give all the world we could lose out of the account of our lives, and could loose the very remembrance of it ? I think that somewhat worse than lost time, which forfeits a blessed eternity, and for which men must lose their souls for ever.

3ly, That is lost time too, which men must live over again, and tread back their steps like him who has mistaken his way ; not that we can recal our past time, and those minutes that are fled from us, but we must substitute some of our remaining time in its room, and begin our lives again, and undo what we had formerly done. This is the case of those who have spent great part of their lives ill, whenever they are convinced of their folly and danger ; they must give all their past lives for lost, and it may be, when half, or two thirds, or more of their lives are spent, they must then begin to live, and to undo, by repentance and reformation, the errors, and follies, and impieties of their former lives : now I suppose all men will confess that time to be lost, which they must unlive again ; to be sure penitents are very sensible it is, and I wish all those would consider it, who resolve to spend their youthful and vigorous age in sin, and to repent hereafter ; that is, they resolve to fling away the greatest and best part of their lives, and to begin to live when they see themselves a dying : this I am sure is no remedy against a short life, to resolve not to live one third of it.

2ly, Since our life is so very short, it becomes us to live as much as we can in so short a time ; for we must not measure the length or shortness of our lives by days, or months, or years, that is the measure of our duration or being, but to live and to be, are two things, and of a distinct consideration and account.

To live, when we speak of a man, signifies to act like a reasonable creature, to exercise his understanding and will upon such objects as answer the dignity and perfection of human nature, to be employed in such actions as are proper to his nature, and distinguish a man from all other creatures : and therefore though a man must eat and drink, and perform the other offices of a natural life, which are common to him with beasts ; yet this is not to live like a man, any otherwise than as these common actions are governed by reason and rules of virtue, but he who minds nothing higher than this, lives like a beast, not like a man : a life of reason, religion, and virtue, is properly the life of a man, because it is peculiar to him, and distinguishes him from all other creatures in this world ; and therefore he who improves his knowledge and understanding most, who has his passions and appetites under the best government, who does most good, and makes himself most useful to the world, though he does not continue longer, yet he lives more and longer than other men ; that is, he exerts more frequent and more perfect acts of a rational life.

But besides this, this life is only in order to a better life ; it is not for itself, but only a passage to a state of trial and probation for immortality ; and it were hardly worth the while to come into the world upon any meaner design : and therefore he lives most, who improves the grace of God to make himself most fit for heaven, and qualified for the greatest rewards, for the richest and the brightest crown : who knows God most, and worships him in the most perfect manner, with the greatest ravishments and transports of spirit, who lives most above this world in the exercise of the most divine virtues, who does most service to God in the world, and improves all his talents to the best advantage ; in a word, who most adorns and perfects his own mind, brings most glory to God, and does most good to men : such a man at thirty years old, has lived more, nay, indeed may properly be said to have lived longer than an old decrepit sinner ; for he has not lived at all to the purposes of a man, or to the ends of the other world. That man has lived a great while, how short soever the time be, who is old enough for heaven, and for eternity, who has laid up rich and glorious treasures for himself in the other world, who has answered the ends of this life, and is fit to remove out of it ; this is the true way of measuring our lives by acts of piety and virtue, by our improvements in knowledge, and grace, and wisdom, by our ripeness for another world ; and therefore if we would live a great while in this world, we must, 1. Begin to live betimes. 2. We must have a care of all interruptions and intermissions of life. 3. We must live apace.

1. We must begin to live betimes ; that is, must begin betimes to live like men, and like christians, to live to God, and to another world, that is, in a word, to be good betimes : for those who begin to live with the first bloomings of reason and understanding, and give early and youthful specimens of piety and virtue, if they reach to old age, they live three times as long as those who count indeed as many years as they do, but it may be have not lived a third of their time, but have lost it in sin and folly. The first can look back to the very beginning of this life, and enjoy all his past years still, review them with pleasure and satisfaction, and bring them all to account : but a late penitent must date his life from his repentance and reformation ; he dares look no farther back, for all beyond is lost, or worse than lost : it is like looking back upon the rude chaos, which was nothing but confusion and darkness, before God formed the world, such is the life of a sinner before this new birth and new creation ; and therefore he has but a very little way to look back, can give but a very short account of his life, has but a very few years of his life which he dares own, and carry into the other world with him.

2. We must have a care of all interruptions and intermissions of life ; that is, of falling back into sin again after some hopeful beginnings : this is too often seen, that those, who by the care, and good government, and wise instructions of parents and tutors, have had the principles of virtue and piety early instilled into them, and have had a good relish of it themselves ; yet when they are got loose from these restraints, and fall into ill company, and into the way of temptations, have a mind to try another kind of life, and to taste those pleasures which they see mankind so fond of, and too often try so long till they grow as great strangers to piety and virtue, as they were ignorant of vice before. Now if such men ever be reclaimed again, yet all their early beginnings of life are lost, for here is a long interruption and intermission of life, which sets them back in the account of eternity ; and thus it is proportionably in every wilful sin we commit, it makes a break in our lives, does not only stop our progress for a while, but sets us backward. But he who begins betimes to live, without any, or very few, and very short interruptions, will be able to reckon a very long life by that time he attains to the common period of human life.

3. Especially if he live apace : there is a living apace, as some call it, not to lengthen but to shorten life ; when men by minding their business well, can in ten or twenty years destroy such a constitution of body, and exhaust that vital heat and vigor, which would have lasted another man sixty or eighty years : this is to live much in a little time, and to make an end of their lives quickly ; and the living apace, I mean, is to live much also in a little time, but to double and treble our lives, not to shorten them ; that is, to do all the good that ever we can ; for the more good we do, the more we live ; life is not mere duration, but action ; time is not life, but we live, that is, we act in time ; and he who does two days work in one, lives as much in one day, as other men do in two : he who in one year does as much improve his mind in knowledge and wisdom, and all christian graces and virtues, worships God as much and more devoutly, does as much good to the world in all capacities and relations of life, as another man does in two or three or four ; he lives so much proportionably longer than those other men ; he does the work of so much time, and this is equivalent to, nay much better than living so much time ; for he who can have the reward of two hundred years in the next world, and not live above three score or four score here, I take to be a much happier man, than he who spends two hundred years in this world : this is the best way of lengthening our lives by living doubly and trebly, which will make a vast addition to our lives in fifty or sixty years ; and then there will be no reason to complain of the shortness of them.

3ly, If our lives are so very short as most men complain they are, surely we have little reason to complain of spending the whole of these short lives in the service of God, for an eternal reward : what are three score or four score years, when compared to eternity ? And therefore setting aside all the present advantages and pleasures of a life of religion, this only is to live, to improve and perfect our own natures, to serve God, and to do good in the world : suppose there were nothing in religion, but hardships and difficulties, a perpetual force and violence to nature, a constant war with the world and the flesh ; cannot we endure all this so short a time, for an endless reward ? Men think their day's work very well spent, when they receive their wages at night, and can go home and sup cheerfully with their family, and sleep sweetly, as laboring men use to do, all night ; and yet our Savior compares all the work and industry of our lives to day laborers, in the parable of the householder, who at several hours of the day, hired laborers to work in his vineyard, and paid them their wages at night, Matth. xx. 1, &c.

We all confess, that three score and ten years, if we live so long, is but a very short time in itself, and quickly passes away ; I am sure we all think so, when it is gone ; and yet consider, how much of this time is cut off by infancy, childhood, and youth, while we are under the care and conduct of parents and governors, and are not our own men ; how much is spent in sleeping, in eating and drinking, and necessary diversions, for the support and repair of these mortal bodies ; in our necessary business to provide for our families, or to serve the public, which God allows and requires of us, and accounts it serving himself ; while we live like men, are sober and temperate, and just and faithful to our trust, which we should do for our own sakes, and which all well governed societies require of us, without any consideration of another world ; so that there is but a very little of this very short life spent purely in the service of God, and in the care of our souls, and the concerns of a future state ? And is this too much for an eternity of bliss and happiness ? To complain of sobriety, and temperance, and moral honesty, as such insufferable burdens, that a man had better be damned than submit to them, is not so much to complain of the laws of God, as of all the wise governments in the world, even in the heathen world, which branded all these vices with infamy, and restrained and corrected them with condign punishments ; it is to complain of human nature, which has made all these vices infamous, and to think it better to be damned than to live like men ; and yet above two thirds of our time requires the exercise of few other virtues but these : and whatever difficulties men may imagine in other acts of religion, if they can possibly think it so intolerable to love the greatest and the best being, to praise and adore him to whom we owe ourselves and all we have, to ask the supply of our wants from him, who will be sure to give, if we faithfully ask ; to raise our hearts above this world, which is a scene of vanity, emptiness or misery, and to delight ourselves in the hope and expectations of great and eternal happiness, wherein the very life of religion consists : I say, if these be such very difficult and uneasy things, (which one would wonder how they came to be difficult, or why they should be thought so ;) yet they employ very little of our time, and methinks a man might bear it to be happy for ever : I am sure men take a great deal more pains for this world, than heaven would cost them, and when they have it, do not live to enjoy it ; and if this be thought worth their while, surely to spend a short life in the service of God, to obtain an endless and eternal happiness, is the best and most advantageous spending our time ; and we must have a very mean opinion of heaven and eternal happiness, if we think it not worth the obedience and service of a few years, how difficult soever that were ?

4tly, If our lives are so very short at their utmost extent, the sinful pleasures of this world can be no great temptation, when compared with an eternity of happiness or misery. Those sensual pleasures, which men are so fond of, and for the sake of which they break the laws of God, and provoke his justice, forfeit immortal life, and expose themselves to all the miseries and sufferings of an eternal death, can last no longer than we live in this world ; and how little a while is that ? When we put off these bodies, all bodily pleasures perish with them ; nay indeed as our bodies die and decay by degrees, before they tumble into the grave, so do our pleasures sensibly decay too : as short as our lives are, men may outlive some of their most beloved vices, and therefore how luscious soever they may be, such short and dying pleasures ought not to come in competition with eternal happiness or misery ; whatever things are in their own nature, the value of them increases or diminishes according to the length or shortness of their enjoyment ; that which will last our lives, and make them easy and comfortable, is to be preferred, by wise men, before the most ravishing enjoyments of a day ; and a happiness which will outlast our lives, and reach to eternity, is to be preferred before the perishing enjoyments of a short life ; unless men can think it better to be happy for three score years, than for ever ; nay, unless men think the enjoyments of three score years a sufficient recompence for eternal want and misery.

5tly, The shortness of our lives is a sufficient answer to all those arguments against providence, taken from the prosperity of bad men, and the miseries and afflictions of the good ; for both of them are so short, that they are nothing in the account of eternity. Were this life to be considered by itself, without any relation to a future state, the difficulty would be greater, but not very great ; because a short happiness, or a short misery, checquered and intermixed as all the happiness and miseries of this life are, is not very considerable ; nor were it worth the while either to make objections against providence, or to answer them, if death put an end to us.

Bad men who make these objections against providence, are very well contented to take the world as they find it, so they may have it without a providence, which is a sign that it is not their dislike of this world (though many times they suffer as much in it, as good men do) which makes them quarrel at providence, but the dread and fear of another world : and this proves, that they think this world a very tolerable place, whether there be a providence or not. And if so short a life as this is, be but tolerable, it is a sufficient justification of providence, that this life is well enough for its continuance, a very mixed and imperfect state indeed, but very short too ; such a state as bad men themselves would like very well without another life after it, and such a state as good men like very well with another life to follow : it is not a spite at human life, which makes them reject a providence, as any one would guess, who hears them object their own prosperity, and the calamities of good men, as arguments against providence, both which they like very well ; and whatever there may be in these objections, supposing there were no other life after this, yet when they all vanish at the very naming of another life, where good men shall be rewarded, and the wicked punished ; it is ridiculous to prove, that there is no other life after this, because rewards and punishments are not dispensed with that exact justice in this life, as we might suppose God would observe, if there were no other life. To prove that there is no other life after this, because good men and bad men do not receive their just rewards in this life, is an argument which becomes the wit and understanding of an atheist ; for they must first take it for granted, that there is no providence, before this argument can prove any thing ; for if there be a providence, then the prosperity of bad men, and the sufferings of the good, is a much better argument, that there is another life after this, where rewards and punishments shall be more equally distributed : thus when they dispute against providence from the prosperity of bad men, and the calamities of the good, before this can prove any thing, they must take it for granted, that there is no other life after this, where good men shall be rewarded, and the wicked punished ; for if there be, it is easy enough to justify the providence of God, as to the present prosperity of bad men, and sufferings of the good : so that they must of necessity dispute in a circle, as the papists do between the church and the scriptures, when they either prove, that there is no providence, nor no life after this, from the unequal rewards and punishments of good and bad men in this world : for in effect they prove that there is no providence, because there is no life after this, or that there is no life after this, because there is no providence ; for the prosperity of bad men, and the sufferings of the good, proves neither of them, unless you take the other for granted ; and if you will prove them both by this medium, you must take them both for granted by turns ; and that is the easier and safer way to take them for granted, without exposing themselves to the scorn of wise men, by such kind of proofs. But yet though this were no objection against the being of another world, and a providence, yet had the prosperity of bad men, and the calamities of the good continued some hundred years, it had been a greater difficulty, and a greater temptation than now it is. The prosperity of the wicked is a much less objection, when it is so easily answered as the psalmist does, yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be ; yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be, Psalm. xxxvii. 10. When the very same persons, who have been the spectators and witnesses of his prosperous villanies, live to see a quick and sudden end of him : I have seen the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay tree ; yet he passed away, and lo he was not ; yea, I sought him, but he could not be found, 35, 36. And this is enough also to support the spirits of good men : For this cause we faint not, but though our outward man perish, yet the inward man is renewed day by day ; for our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, 2 Cor. xiv. 16, 17.

SECT. V. The time, and manner, and circumstances of every particular man's death, is not determined by an absolute and unconditional decree.

THOUGH God, who knows all things, does know also the time, and manner, and circumstances of every particular man's death, yet it does not appear, that he has by an absolute and unconditional decree, fixed and determined the particular time of every man's death. This is that famous question, which Beverovicius, a learned physician, was so much concerned to have resolved, and consulted so many learned men about, as supposing it would be a great injury to his profession, did men believe, that the time of their death was so absolutely determined by God, that they could neither die sooner, nor live longer than that fatal period, whether they took the advice and prescriptions of the physicians or not. But this was a vain fear, for there are some speculations, which men never live by, how vehemently soever they contend for them. A sceptic, who pretends that there is nothing certain and will dispute with you as long as you please about it, yet will not venture his own arguments so far, as to leap into the fire or water, nor to stand before the mouth of a loaded cannon, when you give fire to it. Thus men who talk most about fatal necessity, and absolute decrees, yet they will eat and drink to preserve themselves in health, and take physic when they are sick, and as heartily repent of their sins, and vow amendment and reformation, when they think themselves a dying, as if they did not believe one word of such absolute decrees, and fatal necessity, as they talk of at other times.

I do not intend to engage in this dispute of necessity and fate, of prescience and absolute decrees, which will be disputes as long as the world lasts, unless men grow wiser than to trouble themselves with such questions as are above their reach, and which they can never have a clear notion and perception of; but all that I intend is, to shew you, according to the scripture account of it, that the period of our lives is not so preemptorily determined by God, but that we may lengthen or shorten them, live longer, or die sooner, according as we behave ourselves in this world.

Now this is very plain from all those places of scripture, where God promises long life to good men, and threatens to shorten the lives of the wicked: xix. Psal. 16. With long life will I satisfy him, and shew him my salvation. Solomon tells us of wisdom, length of days is in her right hand, and in her left riches and honors, Prov. iii. 16. The fear of the Lord prolongeth days, but the years of the wicked shall be shortened, Prov. x. 27. Thus God has promised long life to those who honor their parents, in the fifth commandment; and the same promise is made in more general terms to those who observe the statutes and commandments of God, Deut. iv. 40. Upon the same condition God promised long life to King Solomon, 1 Kings iii. 14. And if thou wilt walk in my ways, to keep my statutes and commandments, as thy father David did walk, then will I lengthen thy days. The same is supposed in David's prayer to God, not to take him away in the midst of his days, Psal. cii. 24. And in Psal. lv. 23. he tells us, that bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days. Now one would reasonably conclude from hence, that God has not absolutely and unconditionally promised to prolong men's lives, or threatened to shorten them ; for what place can there be for conditional promises, where an absolute decree is past? How can any man be said not to live out half his days, if he lives as long as God has decreed he shall live ? for if the period of every particular man's life be determined by God, none are his days, but what God has decreed for him.

As for matter of fact, it is plain and evident, both that men shorten their own lives, and that God shortens them for them, and that in such a manner as will not admit of an absolute and unconditional decree : thus some men destroy a healthful and vigorous constitution of body by intemperance and lust, and do as manifestly kill themselves, as those who hang, or poison, or drown themselves ; and both these sorts of men, I suppose, may be said to shorten their own lives ; and so do those who rob, or murder, or commit any other villany, which forfeits their lives to public justice ; or quarrel and fall in a duel, and the like ; and yet you will no more say, that God decreed and determined the death of these men, than he did their sin.

Thus God himself very often shortens the lives of men, by plague, and famine, and sword, and such other judgments, as he executes upon a wicked world ; and this must be confest to be the effect of God's counsel and decrees, as a judge decrees and pronounces the death of a malefactor ; but this is not an absolute and unconditional decree, but is occasioned by their sins and provocations, as all judgments are ; they might have lived longer, and escaped these judgments, had they been virtuous, and obedient to God : for if they should have lived no longer, whether they had sinned or not, their death, by what judgments soever they are cut off, is not so properly the execution of justice, as of a peremptory decree ; their lives are not shortened, but their fatal period is come.

Indeed, unless we make the providence of God, not the government of a wise and free agent, who acts pro re nata, and rewards and punishes as men deserve, as the scripture represents it, but an unavoidable execution of a long series of fatal and necessary events from the beginning to the end of the world, as the Stoics thought, we must acknowledge, that in the government of free agents, God has reserved to himself a free liberty of lengthening or shortening men's lives, as will best serve the ends of providence : for if we will allow man to be a free agent, and that he is not under a necessity of sinning, and deserving to be cut off at such a time, or in such a manner, the application of rewards and punishments to him must be free also, or else they may be ill applied : he may be punished when he deserves to be rewarded ; the fatal period of life may fall out at such a time when he most of all deserves long life, and when the lengthening his life would be a public blessing to the world. Fatal and necessary events can never be fitted to the government of free agents, no more than you can make a clock, which shall strike exactly for time and number, when such a man speaks, let him speak when, or name what number he pleases : and yet there is nothing of greater moment in the government of the world, than a free power and liberty of lengthening or shortening men's lives ; for nothing more over-awes mankind, and keeps them more in dependence on God ; nothing gives a more signal demonstration of a divine power, or vengeance, or protection : nothing is a greater blessing to families or kingdoms, or a greater punishment to them, than the life or death of a parent, of a child, of a prince, and therefore it is as necessary to reserve this power to God, as to assert a providence. There are two or three places of scripture, which are urged in favor of the contrary opinion, Job. xiv. 5. Seeing his days are determined, the number of his months are with thee, thou hast appointed his bounds that he cannot pass. Job vii. 1. Is there not an appointed time to man upon earth ? Are not his days also like the days of an hireling ? Which refer not to the particular period of every man's life, but as I observed before, to the general period of human life, which is fixed and determined, which is there called the days or the years of a man, because God has appointed this the ordinary time of man's life ; as when God threatens, that the wicked shall not live out half their days, that is, half that time which is allotted for men to live on earth ; for they have no other interest in these days, but that they are the days of a man, and therefore might be their days too.

From what I have now discoursed, there are two things very plainly to be observed. 1. That men may contribute very much to the lengthening or shortening their own lives. 2. That the providence of God does peculiarly over-rule and determine this matter.

1. As for the first, there is no need to prove it, for we see men destroy their own lives every day, either by intemperance and lust, or more open violence ; by forfeiting their lives to public justice, or by provoking the divine vengeance ; and therefore whoever desires a long life, to fill up the number of his days, which God has allotted us in this world, must keep himself from such destructive vices, must practise the most healthful virtues, must make God his friend, and engage his providence for his defence. Can any thing be more absurd than to hear men promise themselves long life, and reckon upon forty or fifty years to come, when they run into these excesses, which will make a quick and speedy end of them ? Which will either inflame and corrupt their blood, and let a fever, or a dropsy into their veins, or rottenness into their bones, or engage them in some fatal quarrel, ruin their estates, and send them to seek their fortune upon the road, which commonly brings them to the gallows ; what a fatal cheat is this, which men put upon themselves? Especially when they sin in hope of time to repent, and commit such sins as will give them no time to repent in?

The advice of the Psalmist is much better, What man is he that desireth life, and loveth many days, that he may see good? keep thy tongue from evil, and thy lips from speaking guile; depart from evil, and do good; seek peace, and pursue it: these are natural and moral causes of a long life: but that is not all, for the eyes of the Lord are upon the righteous, and his ears are open unto their cry: the face of the Lord is against them that do evil, to cut off the remembrance of them from the earth: that is, God will prolong the lives of good men, and cut off the wicked; not that this is a general rule without exception; but it is the ordinary method of providence, Psal. xxxiv. 12, 13, &c.

2. For though God has not determined how long every man shall live by an absolute and unconditional decree, yet if a sparrow does not fall to the ground without our Father, much less does man: no man can go out of this world, no more than he can come into it, but by a special providence; no man can destroy himself but by God's leave; no disease can kill, but when God pleases; no mortal accident can befall us, but by God's appointment; who is therefore said to deliver the man into the hands of his neighbor, who is killed by an evil accident, Deut. xix. 4, 5. Those wasting judgments of plague and pestilence, famine and sword, are appointed by God, and have their particular commissions where to strike ; as we may see Lev. xxvi. 47. Jer. vi. 7. Isa. lxxv. 12. Jer. xv. 2. Psal. xci. and several other places. All the rage and fury of men cannot take away our lives, but by God's particular permission, Mat. x. 28, 29, 30, 31.

And this lays as great an obligation on us, as the love of life can, which is the dearest thing in this world, to serve and please God ; this will make us secure from all fears and dangers ; My times, saith David, are in thy hand, deliver me from the hand of mine enemies, and from them that persecute me, Psal. xxxi. 15. This encourages us to pray to God for ourselves, or our freinds, whatever danger our lives are in, either from sickness, or from men : there is no cause wherein he cannot help us, when he sees fit ; he can rectify the disorders of nature, and correct an ill habit of body, and rebuke the most raging distempers which mock at all the arts of physic, and power of drugs, and many times does so by insensible methods : to conclude, this is a great satisfaction to good men, that our lives are in the hands of God ; that though there be not such a fixed and immoveable period set to them, yet death cannot come but by God's appointment.

SECT. VI. The particular time when we are to die, is unknown and uncertain to us.

III. THE particular time when any of us are to die, is unknown and uncertain to us, and this is that which we properly call the uncertainty of our lives ; that we know not when we shall die, whether this night or to-morrow, or twenty years hence. There is no need to prove this, but only to mind you of it, and to acquaint you, what wise use you are to make of it.

1. This shews how unreasonable it is to flatter ourselves with the hope of long life ; I mean of prolonging our lives near the utmost term and period of human life, which though it be but short in itself, is yet the longest that any man can hope to live : no wise man will promise himself that which he can have no reason to expect, but what has very often failed others : for let us seriously consider, what reason any of us have to expect a long life ; is it because we are young, and healthful, and vigorous ? And do we not daily see young men die ? Can youth, or beauty, or strength secure us from the arrests of death ? Is it because we see some men live to a great age ? But this was no security to those who died young, and left a great many men behind them, who had lived twice or thrice their age, and therefore we also may see a great many old men, and die young ourselves. It is possible, we may live to old age, because some do ; but it is more likely we shall not, because there are more that die young. The truth is, the time of dying is so uncertain, the ways of dying so infinite, so unseen, so casual and fortuitous to us, that instead of promising ourselves long life, no wise man will promise himself a week, nor venture any thing of great moment and consequence upon it : the hope of long life is nothing else but self flattery ; the fondness men have for life, and that partiality they have for themselves, persuades them, that they shall live as long as any man can live, and shall escape those diseases, and fatal accidents with which our bills of mortality are filled every week ; but then you should consider, that other men are as dear to themselves, as you are, and flatter themselves as much with long life, as you do, but their hopes very often deceive them, and so may yours.

But you will say, to what purpose is all this ? Why so much pains to put us out of conceit with the hope of living long ? For what hurt is it, if we do flatter ourselves a little more in this matter, than we have reason for ? If it should prove only a deceitful dream, yet it makes life cheerful and comfortable, and gives us a true relish of it ; and why should we disturb ourselves, and make life uneasy, by the perpetual thoughts of dying ?

Now, I confess, were there no hurt and danger in it, this were as ill natured and spiteful a thing, as could be done ; and the least recompence I could make, would be to ask you pardon for it, and leave you to enjoy the comforts of life securely for the future, to live on as long as you can, and let death come when it will, without being looked for ; but I apprehend a great deal of danger in such deceitful and flattering hopes, and that is the reason why I dissuade you from it. For,

1. The hope of long life is apt to make us fond of this world, which is as great a mischief to us, as to expose us to all the temptations and flatteries of it : that we must die, and leave this world, is a good reason indeed, why we should live like pilgrims and strangers here, as I observed before : but few men, who hope to live three score years, think much of this ; tho' it be comparatively short in respect of eternity, yet it is a great while to live, and a great while to enjoy this world in ; and that is thought a very valuable happiness, which can be enjoyed so long ; and then men let loose their desires and affections, endeavor to get as much of this world as they can, and not only to taste, but to take full and plentiful draughts of the intoxicating pleasures of it : and how dangerous this is, I need not tell any man, who considers, that all the wickedness of mankind, is owing to too great a fondness and passion for this world.

And therefore if we would live like pilgrims, and sit loose from all the enjoyments of this world, we must remember, that our stay is uncertain here, that we have no lease of our lives, but may be turned out of our earthly tenements at pleasure : for what man would be fond of laying up great treasures on earth, who remembers, that this night his soul may be taken from him, and then, whose shall all these things be ? What man would place his happiness in such enjoyments, which for ought he knows, he may be taken from to-morrow ? These are indeed melancholy and mortifying considerations, and that is the true use of them ; for it is necessary we should be mortified to this world, to cure the love of it, and conquer its temptations ; for if any man love the world, the love of the father is not in him : for all that is in the world, the lusts of the flesh, the lusts of the eye, and the pride of life, is not of the father, but of the world.

2. As the hopes of long life gives great advantage to the temptations of this world, so they weaken the hopes and fears of the other world : they strengthen our temptations and weaken us, which must needs be of very fatal consequence to us in our spiritual warfare. All that we have to oppose against the flattering temptations of this world, are the hopes and fears of the world to come ; but the hope of long life sets the next world at too great a distance to conquer this : what is present, works more powerfully upon our minds, than what is absent ; and the farther any thing is off, the less powerful it is.

To make you sensible of this, I shall only desire you to remember, what thoughts you have had of another world, when the present fears of dying have given you a nearer view of it : good Lord, what agonies have I seen dying sinners in ! How penitent, how devote, how resolved upon a new course of life, which too often vanish like a dream, when the fear of death is over ; what is the reason of this difference ? Heaven and hell is the very same, when we are in health, as when we are sick ; and I will suppose that you do as firmly believe a heaven and a hell in health, as in sickness ; the only thing then that makes the thoughts of the other world so strong, and powerful, and affecting, when we are sick, is, that we see the other world near us, that we are just a stepping into it, and this makes it our present concern ; but in health, we see the other world a great way off, and therefore do not think it of such near and present concern ; and what we do not think ourselves at present, concerned in, or not much concerned in, how great and valuable soever it be in itself, will either not affect us at all, or very little. Thus while bad men place the other world at a great distance from them, and out of sight, they have no restraint at all upon their lusts and passions ; and good men themselves, at the greater distance they see the other world, are as much the less affected by it ; which damps their zeal and their devotion, and makes them less active and vigorous in doing good.

And there is so much the more danger in this, because men look upon the other world as farthest off, and so are least concerned about it, when the thoughts of the other world are most useful and most necessary to them ; in the heat and vigor of youth, men are most exposed to the temptations of flesh and sense, and have most need to think of another world, and a future judgment ; but those who promise themselves a long life, see death and another world so far off, while they are young, that it moves them as little, as if there were no other world.

And though one would think, that as our lives waste, and the other world grows near, so we should recover a more lively sense of it, yet we find it quite otherwise : when men have been used to think the next world a great way off, they will never think it near, till it comes ; and when they have been used to think of the other world without any passion or concern for it, it is almost an impossible thing, to give any quickness and passion to such thoughts ; for when any thoughts, and the passion that properly belongs to such thoughts, have been a great while separated, it is a hard thing to unite them again ; to begin to think of that with passion and concern, which we have been used for thirty or forty years to think of without any concern.

3. Another dangerous effect of flattering ourselves with long life, is, that it encourages men to sin with the vain hopes and resolutions of repenting before they die : when men are convinced, that if they live and die in sin, they must be miserable for ever ; as I believe most profest christians are, as I am sure all must be, who believe the gospel of our Savior ; there is no other possible way to ward off this blow, and to sin securely under such convictions, but by resolving to repent, and to make their peace with God before they die : they flatter themselves a while, and enjoy the sweets of sin, and gratify their youthful inclinations, and learn the vanity of the world by experience, as their forefathers have done before them, and then they will grow as wise and grave, and declaim against the follies and vanities of youth, and be as penitent and as devout and religious, as any of them all.

Whoever considers the uncertainty of human life, if he should hear men talk at this rate, would either conclude, that they were mad, or merrily disposed, but could never guess, that they were in their wits, and in good earnest too : but if we will allow men to be in their wits, who can promise themselves long life, when they see every day, how uncertain life is : (and if we will not allow such men to be in their wits, above two thirds of the world are mad) this gives a plain account, how men may resolve to sin, while they are young, and to repent when they are old : for it is only the flattering hopes of long life, that can encourage men in a course of sin : men, indeed, who do not promise themselves long life, may commit a particular sin, and resolve to repent of it, as soon as they have done, which are a more modest sort of sinners, of which more presently ; but I speak now of those (and too many such there are) who resolve to take their fill of this world, while youth and strength and health last, and to grow sober and religious, when they grow old ; the consequence of which is, that they resolve to be damned, unless they live till they are old, or till they grow weary of their sins, and learn more wisdom by age and experience.

Now I shall not insist at present upon the hazard such men run, of not living till the time comes, which they have allotted for their repentance, which belongs to another argument ; but only what a dangerous thing it is to be tempted to a custom and habit of sinning, by the hope of long life, and of time enough to repent in ; for there is not a greater cheat in the world, that men put upon themselves, than to indulge themselves in all manner of wickednesses ; to contract strong and powerful habits of vice, with a resolution to repent of their sins, and to forsake them before they die.

The experience of the world sufficiently proves how vain this is ; for though some such men may live while they are old, how seldom is it seen, that they repent of their youthful debaucheries, when they grow old ? They still retain their love and affection for those sins, which they can commit no longer; and repent of nothing, but that they are grown old, and cannot be so wicked as they were, when they were young.

And is there any reason in the world to expect it should be otherwise? Do we not know what the power of habit and custom is? How the love of sin increases, with the repeated commission of it? And is the spending our youthful strength and vigor in sin, like to dispose and prepare us to be sincere penitents, when we grow old? Do we not see that a custom of sinning, in some men, destroys the modesty of human nature; in others, all sense of God and of religion, or of the natural differences of good and evil? Some men sin on till they despise repentance, others till they think repentance is too late; so that though men were sure, that they should live long enough to grow wiser, and to repent and reform the sins and extravagancies of youth; yet no man, who enters upon a wicked course of life, has any reason to expect, that he shall ever repent; and therefore it is extremely dangerous to flatter ourselves into a habit and custom of sinning, with the hopes and expectations that we shall live to repent of our sins: and if this be dangerous, it must be very dangerous to flatter ourselves with the hopes of long life, which is a great temptation to men to sin on, and to delay their repentance till old age.

2. Since the time of our death is so unknown and uncertain to us, we ought always to live in expectation of it ; to be so far from promising ourselves long life, that we should not promise ourselves a day : and the reason for it is plain and necessary, because we are not sure of a day.

This is very true, and therefore to live always in expectation of dying, does not signify a belief that we shall die to-day, but only that we may ; which answers the objection against the uncomfortableness of it ; for such an expectation as this, has nothing of dread and terror in it, but only prudence and caution. Men may live very comfortably, and enjoy all the innocent pleasures of life with these thoughts about them ; to expect death, every day, is like expecting thieves every night ; which does not disturb our rest, but only makes us lock and bar our doors, and provide for our own defence : thus to expect death, is not to live under the perpetual fears of dying, but to live as a wise man would do, who knows, not that he must, but that he may die to day.

That is, to be always prepared for death ; not to defer our repentance and return to God one moment ; not to commit any wilful sin, lest death should surprise us in it ; not to be slothful and negligent, but to be always employed in our master's business, according to our Savior's counsel, Luke. xii. 35, &c. Let your loins be girded about, and your lamps burning ; and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord, when he will return from the wedding, that when he cometh and knocketh, they may open un- to him immediately. Blessed are those servants, whom the Lord when he commeth shall find watching. And this know, that if the good man of the house had known what hour the thief would come, he would have watched, and not suffered his house to be broken through. Be ye therefore ready also ; for the son of man cometh at an hour when ye think not. This our Savior also warns us of, in the parable of the wise and foolish virgins, Matth. xxv. While the bridegroom tarried, they all slept ; but the wise virgins, presently arose, and trimmed their lamps, and went in with him to the marriage, and the door was shut ; the foolish virgins had no oil, and their lamps were gone out, and while they went to buy oil, they were shut out, and could afterwards procure no admission. Watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour when the son of man cometh.

This is the danger of a sudden death, and the reason why our church prays against it ; for were we always in a preparation to die, with our lamps trimmed and burning, like virgins who expect the bridegroom, to die then without notice, without fear and apprehension, without the melancholy solemnities of dying, were a true εὐθανασία the most desirable way of dying ; but the danger of a sudden death is, that men are surprised in their sin, and hurried away to judgment, before their accounts are ready ; that they are snatched out of this world before they have made any provision for the next ; and the only way to prevent this, is to be always in expectation of death, and always prepared for it.

Some men think themselves very safe, if after an age of sin and vanity, they have but so much notice of death, as to ask God's pardon upon a sick bed, to confess and bewail the wickedness of their past lives, to die in horrors and agonies of mind, which they call repentance, but indeed are nothing else but the sad presages of an awakened conscience, distracted with its own guilt, and the terrible expectations of vengeance. But though this be a very comfortless way of dying, and, I fear, generally very hopeless too; yet no man can promise himself so much as this, who does not live in a constant expectation of death. We may be cut off by a sudden stroke, or seized with distraction or stupidity, that if only asking God pardon before we die, would save our souls, we could not do it: and this is the case of so many sinners, that it should be a warning to all. Men who know not when, nor how, or in what manner they must die, ought to be ready prepared against all accidents and surprising events.

3. Since the time of our death is so very uncertain, it concerns us to improve our present time, because no time is ours, but what is present. I observed before, that the shortness of our lives, though we were to live to the utmost extent of them, three score and ten, or four score years, was sufficient reason to lose none of our time, but to improve it to the best and wisest purposes ; and the surest way to lose none of our time, is to improve the present time : and there is a plain necessary reason, why we should do that, because our lives are uncertain ; and therefore no time is ours, but what is present. The time past was ours ; but that is gone, and we can never recal it, nor live it over again : if we have spent it well, we shall find it ours still in our account ; but it is no longer our time to live and act in ; the time to come may be ours, and it may not, because we know not whether we shall live to it, and therefore we cannot reckon upon it ; the time present is ours, and that is the only time that is ours ; and therefore if we will improve our time, we must improve our present time, we must live to-day ; and not put off living till to-morrow.

All mankind are sensible of the necessity and prudence of this in all other matters, excepting the concerns of their souls. An Epicurean sensualist is for the present gratification of his lusts ; Vive hodie is his motto, Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die. Men who are intent upon increasing riches, and advancing their fortune and honors, are for taking the present time and opportunity to do it. Indeed, setting aside the consideration of the uncertainty of our lives, there are some things which a wise man will not delay, or put off to another time, when he has opportunity to do it at present.

What is necessary to be done, he will do as soon as he can, the very first moment that it becomes necessary, if opportunity serves.

What is necessary every day, he will not put off from one day to another, but will do it every day ; as eating or drinking and sleeping are.

What he resolves to do, and may as well do at present, and is as fit to be done at present, as at any other time, he will do at present.

What may suffer by delays, he will do the first time he can do it.

What is proper for some peculiar times and seasons, he will do when those times and seasons come ; as the husbandman observes the seasons for sowing and reaping ; the tradesman his markets and fairs.

What is of present use and convenience to him, what he takes great pleasure in, or what he mightily longs for and desires, he will by no means delay, but is for doing at present.

Now all these are very weighty reasons why we should take care of our souls, repent of our sins, live in the practice of all christian graces and virtues, and do all the good we can at present ; but much more, when we consider that our lives are so uncertain, that we may have no other time to do any thing of this in, but what is present.

For, 1. Is any thing of more absolute necessity, than the salvation of our souls ? This is that one thing needful ; the salvation of our souls is needful, as a necessary end ; and the practice of true religion needful, as subservient to that end. If to escape eternal misery, and to obtain eternal happiness, be not necessary, I know not what can make any thing necessary. And if this cannot be done without the knowledge and practice of true religion, that is as necessary as the salvation of our souls is : and can any present time, how early soever it be, be too soon to do that, which is necessary to be done ? Especially when we are not sure of any other time to do it in ; no time is too soon to do that which is absolutely necessary : and no wise man will neglect doing that at present, which unless it be done, he must be miserable for ever ; and yet it may never be done, if it be not done at present.

2. Is not religion, and the care of our souls, the work of every day, as much as eating and drinking to preserve our bodily health and strength is ? Must we not pray to God every day, and make his laws the rule of our actions every day, and repent of our sins, and do what good we can every day ? And what is the work of every day, we ought to do every day, though we were secure of living till to-morrow ; much more when we know that we may die before another day comes.

3. Do ye not all resolve to repent of your sins, and reform your lives, before ye die ? And is it not as necessary to repent of your sins to-day, as ever it will be ? Is not to-day, as proper a time to repent in, as ever you are likely to have ? Are you sure of having another day to repent in, if you neglect this ? This may convince any considering man, that no resolutions of repenting hereafter, can be sincere, because such men resolve indeed to repent, but do not resolve to do it at such a time when they can do it ; that is the present time, which alone they are sure of ; but put it off till another time, which may never be theirs.

I grant, men may sincerely resolve to do that hereafter, a month, or half a year, or a year hence, which they do not think so fitting and convenient to do at present ; but then this is not an absolute resolution to do such a thing ; but a conditional resolution, that they will do it, if they live to such a time, when it will be convenient to be done.

Consider then, which of these you mean, when you resolve to repent ; is it only a conditional resolution, that you will repent, if you live till such a time ? I grant, there is some sense in this resolution ; but I wish you would consider, what danger there is in it too. For are you contented to be eternally miserable, if you do not live till your time of repentance comes ! No, this you tremble at the thoughts of, and resolve to repent, because you resolve not to be miserable for ever ; that is, you absolutely resolve to repent ; you are convinced this is absolutely necessary ; it is a work that must be done, and you are resolved to do it : consider then, how vain and contradictory this resolution is, to resolve to repent hereafter ; which is an absolute resolution, with a condition annexed to it, and a very uncertain one too ; a resolution certainly to repent, but not in a certain but uncertain time ; and yet those who repent must repent in some time ; and repentance can never be certain, when the time to repent in, is uncertain. Indeed no resolution is good, which is not for the present time, when there are no exceptions against doing it at present, especially when there is such manifest danger in deferring it. To resolve to repent hereafter, when the present time is the only certain time to repent in, only signifies, that men are convinced of the necessity of repentance ; but love their sins so well, that they cannot part with them yet ; and therefore, that they may sin on securely, without the perpetual fears and terrors of another world, they resolve to repent hereafter. Now though there were no such manifest danger in a delay, from the uncertainty of our lives, yet let any man judge, whether such resolutions as these, are ever like to take effect ; a resolution which is owing to a great love to sin, and is intended only to silence men's guilty fears, and give them a present security in sinning ; for this reason they resolve not to repent now, but to repent hereafter ; and if they keep this resolution, they will never repent ; for their hereafter will never come, which does not signify any set and determined time, but any time which is not present. The reason why they resolve not to repent to-day, will extend to every day, when it comes ; that is, that they love their sins, and are unwilling to part with them ; and the reason why they resolve to repent hereafter, will serve for all hereafters, but will never serve for any time present, viz. because they will not repent yet, and yet will flatter themselves into security with the vain hopes of repentance. Flatter not yourselves then with vain hopes ; he who resolves to repent presently, though he knows he is sure of no other time but the present to repent in, does not sincerely resolve to repent, but only resolves to delay his repentance.

The like may be said concerning the danger of delays, concerning missing the proper times and seasons of action, and neglecting that which is of present use to us, and which we ought above all things to desire, viz. to secure the happiness of our immortal souls ; but I shall only add this one thing to make you sensible, what it is to let slip the present time, without improving it to any wise purposes ; that he who loses his present time, loses all the time he has, all the time that he can call his own ; which is the sum of all other arguments ; that the present time is the only time he has to live in, to repent in, to serve God, and to do good to men in, to improve his knowledge, and to exercise his graces, and to prepare himself for a blessed immortality ; which are the most necessary, the most useful, the most desirable things in the world ; and that which gives the value to time itself, which is valuable only for the sake of what may be done, and what may be enjoyed in it.

But you will say, at this rate we must spend our whole lives in the duties of religion, in thinking of God, and another world, in acts of repentance and mortification, in prayer and fasting, and such like exercises of devotion ; here will be no time left for the ordinary affairs of life, scarce to eat or drink, or sleep in, but that they will have some of our time, whether we will or no ; but there is no allowance made for recreations and diversions, for the conversation of friends, and innocent mirth and pastime, to refresh our wearied bodies and minds ; for if we must be so careful to improve our present time to the best purposes, our present time is our whole time ; for we have no time but what is present, and as one minute succeeds another, still we must improve it to the best purposes ; that is, we can do but one thing all our lives, and the best way then would be to turn hermits, and sequester ourselves from the world and human conversation.

The answer of this objection will teach us, what it is to improve our present time, and how it must be done.

Now, 1. I allow the objection so far, that if a man have mispent great part of his life, have contracted great guilt, and powerful habits of vice, the chief, and almost the only thing such a man can do, is to bewail his sins before God, and with earnest and repeated importunities to beg his pardon ; to live in a state of penance and mortification, to deny himself the pleasures and comforts of life, till he has in some measure subdued his love of sin, and regained the command and government of his passions, and has recovered the peace of his mind, and some good hopes, that God has forgiven him, and received him into favor for the sake of Christ ; thus he ought to do no otherwise : and while he is terrified with the fears of hell, he has little stomach to the necessary affairs and business of life, much less to the mirth and pleasures of it ; but this is such an interruption to the ordinary and regular course of life, as a fit of sickness is, which confines us to our bed, or to our chamber, and makes us incapable of minding any thing, but the recovery of our health ; and when this is the case, then indeed the care of our souls is the only necessary business, and the only employment of our time.

2. But when this is not the case, the wise improvement of our present time does not confine us always to be upon our knees, or doing something which has a direct and immediate aspect upon God and another world, for the state of this world will not admit of that ; but he employs his time well who divides it among all the affairs and offices of his life, between this world and the next, and employs the several portions of his time in things fit and proper for such a season ; who begins and ends the day with adoring his Maker and Redeemer, blessing him for all his mercies both temporal and spiritual, begging the pardon of all his sins, the protection of his providence, the assistance of his grace, and then minds his secular affairs with justice and righteousness, eats and drinks with sobriety and temperance, does all good offices for men, as occasion serves, and if he have any spare time, improves it for the increase of his knowledge, by reading and meditating on the scriptures, or other useful books, or refreshes himself with the innocent and cheerful conversation of his friends, or such other diversions as are not so much a loss and expence of time, as a necessary relaxation of the mind to recruit our spirits, and to make us more fit either for business or devotion ; but then on days set apart for the more public and solemn acts of worship, religion is his chief employment, for that is the proper work of the day, to worship God, and to examine the state of his soul, to learn his duty more perfectly, and to affect his mind with such a powerful sense of God and another world, as may arm him against all temptations, when he returns to this world again. This is to improve our present time well, to observe the proper times and seasons of action, and to do what is fit and proper for such seasons ; never to do any thing which is evil, and as for the several kinds of good actions, to do what particular times and seasons require. Thus we may give a good account of our whole time, even of our most loose and vacant hours ; which it becomes us to do, though we were certain to live many years, but does more nearly concern us when our time is so uncertain.

4. Since our lives are so very uncertain, this ought to cure any anxious care and solicitude for times to come ; we may live many years, though our lives are uncertain, and therefore provident care becomes us ; but we may die also very quickly, and why then should we disturb ourselves with to-morrow's cares, much less with some remoter possibilities ? Hast thou at any time an ill prospect before thee of private or public calamities ? Do the storms gather ? Are the clouds black and lowering, and charged with thunder, and ready to break over thy head ? Shelter thyself as well as thou canst, make all prudent provisions for a storm because thou mayest live to see it ; but be not too much dismayed and terrified with a storm at a distance, for thy head may be laid low enough, and out of its reach, before it breaks ; and then all this trouble and perplexity is in vain. Many such examples have I seen, of men disturbed with ill presages of what was coming, which besides that these things did not happen, which they expected, or were not so black and dismal as their affrighted fancy painted them, if they had come, they were very safe first, and got out of their way.

I do not intend by this to comfort men against foreseen evils, that they may die before they come ; which is a small comfort to most men ; when it may be, death is the most formidable thing in the evils they fear ; but since our lives are uncertain, and we may die, and never see the evils we fear, it is unreasonable to be as much distracted with them, as if they were present and certain : the uncertainty of future events, is one reason why we ought not to be anxious and solicitous about them ; and the uncertainty of our lives is another ; and what is so very uncertain, ought not to be the object of any great concern or passion.

5. For the same reason we ought not to be greatly afraid of men, nor to put our trust and confidence in them, because their lives are very uncertain ; they may not be able to hurt us, when we are most apprehensive of danger from them ; nor to help us, when we need them most : this is the Psalmist's argument, Psalm. cxlvi. 3. 4. Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help : his breath goeth forth, he returneth to the earth ; in that very day his thoughts perish. Isaiah. ii. 22. Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils ; for wherein is he to be accounted of ? Men, especially great and powerful men, may do us a great deal of hurt, and may do us a great deal of good ; and therefore common prudence will teach us by all wise and honest arts to gain their favor, and to avoid all unreasonable and needless provocations ; but yet at best they are such brittle creatures, that they can be the objects only of a subordinate fear or hope ; when the fear of man comes in competition with the fear of God, it is wise counsel which the prophet Isaiah gives, Say ye not, a confederacy, to all them to whom this people shall say, a confederacy ; neither fear ye their fear, nor be afraid. Sanctify the Lord God of Hosts himself, and let him be your fear, and let him be your dread ; and he shall be for a sanctuary, Isaiah. viii. 1, 12 3, 14. There is a vast difference between the power of God and men, which is our Savior's reason, why we should fear God more than men : Be not afraid of them who can kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do ; but I will forewarn ye, whom ye shall fear : fear him, which after he hath killed, hath power to cast into hell ; yea, I say unto you, fear him, Luke. xii. 4, 5. But whatever power men may have to hurt, while they live, they can do us no hurt when they are dead ; and their lives are so very uncertain. that we may be quickly eased of those fears. The same may be said with respect to hope and confidence in men ; though their word and promise were always sacred, yet their lives are uncertain ; Their breath goeth forth, they return to the earth ; in that very day their thoughts perish ; all the good and all the evil they intended to do ; But happy is he that hath the God of Jacob for his help, whose hope is the Lord his God, which hath made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that therein is, who keepeth truth for ever, Psalm. cxlvi. 5, 6.

6. For a conclusion of this argument, I shall briefly vindicate the wisdom and goodness of God, in concealing from us the time of our death : this we are very apt to complain of, that our lives are so very uncertain, that we know not to-day, but that we may die to-morrow ; and we would be mighty glad to meet with any one who could certainly inform us in this matter, how long we are to live : but if we think a little better of it, we shall be of another mind.

For, 1. Though I presume many of you would be glad to know, that you shall certainly live twenty, or thirty, or forty years longer, yet would it be any comfort to know that you must die to-morrow, or some few months, or a year or two hence ? Which may be your case for ought you know ; and this I believe you are not very desirous to know ; for how would this chill your blood and spirits ? How would it overcast all the pleasures and comforts of life ? You would spend your days like men under the sentence of death, while the execution is suspended.

Did all men, who must die young, certainly know it, it would destroy the industry and improvements of half mankind, which would half destroy the world, or be an insupportable mischief to human societies : for what man, who knows that he must die at twenty, or five and twenty, a little sooner or later, would trouble himself with ingenious or gainful arts, or concern himself any more with this world, than just to live so long in it ? And yet how necessary is the service of such men in the world ? What great things do they many times do ? And what great improvements do they make ? How pleasant and diverting is their conversation, while it is innocent ? How do they enjoy themselves, and give life and spirit to the graver age ? How thin would our schools, our shops, our universities, and all places of education be, did they know how little time many of them were to live in the world ! For would such men concern themselves to learn the arts of living, who must die as soon as they have learnt them ! Would any father be at a great expence in educating his child, only that he might die with a little latin and greek, logic and philosophy ! No, half the world must be divided into cloisters, and nunneries, and nurseries for the grave.

Well, you will say, suppose that ; and is not this an advantage above all the inconveniencies you can think of, to secure the salvation of so many thousands who are now eternally ruined by youthful lust and vanities, but would spend their days in piety and devotion, and make the next world their only care, if they knew how little while they were to live here !

Right : I grant this might be a good way to correct the heat and extravagancies of youth ; and so it would be to shew them heaven and hell ; but God does not think fit to do either, because it offers too much force and violence to men's minds ; it is no trial of their virtue, of their reverence for God, of their conquests and victory over this world by the power of faith ; but makes religion a matter of necessity, not of choice ; now God will force and drive no man to heaven, the gospel dispensation is the trial and discipline of ingenious spirits : and if the certain hopes and fears of another world, and the uncertainty of your living here, will not conquer these flattering temptations, and make men seriously religious, as those who must certainly die, and go into another world, and they know not how soon, God will not try, whether the certain knowledge of the time of their death, will make them religious : that they may die young, and that thousands do so, is reason enough to engage young men to expect death, and prepare for it ; if they will venture, they must take their chance, and not say they had no warning of dying young, if they eternally miscarry by their wilful delays.

And besides this, God expects our youthful service and obedience, though we were to live on till old age ; that we may die young, is not the proper, much less the only reason, why we should remember our creator in the days of our youth, but because God has a right to our youthful strength and vigor ; and if this will not oblige us to an early piety, we must not expect that God will set death in our view, to fright and terrify us ; as if the only design God had in requiring our obedience, was not that we might live like reasonable creatures to the glory of their maker and redeemer, but that we might repent of our sins time enough to escape hell. God is so merciful, as to accept of returning prodigals, but does not think fit to encourage us in sin, by giving us notice when we shall die, and when it is time to think of repentance.

2ly. Though I doubt not, but that it would be a great pleasure to you to know that you shall live till old age ; yet consider a little with yourselves, and then tell me, whether you yourselves, can judge it wise and fitting for God to let you know this !

I observed to you before, what danger there is in flattering ourselves with the hopes of long life, that it is apt to make us too fond of this world, when we expect to live so long in it ; that it weakens the hopes and fears of the next world, by removing it at too great a distance from us ; that it encourages men to live in sin, because they have time enough before them to indulge their lusts, and to repent of their sins, and make their peace with God before they die ; and if the uncertain hopes of this undoes so many men, what would the certain knowledge of it do ! Those who are too wise and considerate to be imposed on by such uncertain hopes, might be conquered by the certain knowledge of a long life.

This would take off all restraints from men, and give free scope to their vicious inclinations, when they know, that how wicked soever they were, they should not die before their time was come, and could never be surprised by death, since they certainly knew when it will come ; which destroys one great motive to obedience, that sin shall shorten men's lives, and that virtue and piety shall prolong them : that the wicked shall not live out half their days ; that the fear of the Lord prolongeth days, but the years of the wicked shall be shortened, Prov. x. 27. Such promises and threatenings as these, must be struck out of the bible, should God let all men know the time of their death.

Nay, this would frustrate the methods and designs of providence for the reclaiming sinners : sometimes public calamities, plague, and famine, and sword, alarm a wicked world, and summon men to repentance ; sometimes a dangerous fit of sickness awakens men into a sense of their sins, and works in them a true and lasting repentance ; but all this would be ineffectual, did men know the time of their death, and that such public judgments, or threatening sickness, should not kill them.

The uncertainty of our lives, is a great motive to constant watchfulness, to an early and persevering piety ; but to know when we shall die, could serve no good end, but would encrease the wickedness of mankind, which is too great already ; which is a sufficient vindication of the wisdom of God, in leaving the time of our death unknown and uncertain to us.

SECT. VII. That we must die but once ; or that death translates us to an unchangeable state with the improvement of it.

THE last thing to be considered is, that we must die but once : it is appointed for men once to die. There are from exceptions from this rule, as there are some dying ; that as Enoch and Elias did not die, so some of us have been raised again from the dead, to live in this world, and such men died twice : but this is a certain rule in general, that as all men must die once, so they must die but once ; which needs no other proof, but the daily experience and observation of mankind.

But that which I intend by it is this ; that once dying determines our state and condition for ever ; when we put off these mortal bodies, we must not return into them again, to act over a new part of this world, and to correct the errors and miscarriages of our former lives : death translates us to an immutable and unchangeable state ; that in this sense, what the wise man tells us is true, if the tree fall towards the south, or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth, there it shall be, Eccles. xi. 3. This is a consideration of very great moment, and deserves to be more particularly explained, which I shall do in these following propositions :

1. That this life is the only state of trial and probation for eternity : and therefore, 2. Death whenever it comes, as it puts a final period to this life, that we die once for all, and must never live again as we do now in this world ; so it puts a final end to our work too, that our day of grace, and time of working for another world ends with this life. And 3dly, as a necessary consequence of both these, once dying puts us into an immutable and unchangeable state.

1. That this life only is our state of trial and probation for eternity ; whatever is to be done by us, to obtain the favor of God, and a blessed immortality, must be done in this life.

I observed before, that this life is wholly in order to the next ; that the great, the only necessary business we have to do in this world, is to fit and prepare ourselves to live for ever in God's presence ; To finish the work God has given us to do, that we may receive the reward of good and faithful servants, to enter into our master's rest, I now add, that the only time we have to do this in, is while we live in this world. This is evident from what St. Paul tells us, that we must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad, 2 Cor. v. 10. Now if we must be judged, and receive our final sentence according to what we have done in the body, then our only time of trial and working is while we live in these bodies ; for the future judgment relates only to what is done in the body.

The gospel of Christ is the rule, whereby we must be judged, even that gospel which St. Paul preached, Rom. ii. 16, and all the laws and precepts of the gospel concern the government of our conversation in this world ; and therefore if we be judged by the gospel, we must be judged only for what we have done in this world.

This life, throughout the scripture, is represented as the time of working ; as a race, a warfare, a laboring in the vineyard ; the other world, as a place of recompence, of rewards or punishments ; and if there be such a relation between this world and the next, as between fighting and conquering, and receiving the crown, as between running a race and obtaining a prize, as between the work and the reward ; then we must fight and conquer, run our race, and finish our work in this world, if we expect the rewards of the next.

Many of those graces and virtues, which our Savior has promised to reward with eternal life, can be exercised only in this world : faith and hope are peculiar only to this life, while the other world is absent and unseen. And these are the great principles and graces of the christian life, to believe what we do not see, and to live and act upon the hopes of future rewards : the government of our bodily appetites and passions, by the rules of temperance, sobriety, and chastity, necessarily supposes, that we have bodies, and bodily appetites and passions to govern ; and therefore these virtues can be exercised only while we live in these bodies, which solicit and tempt us to sensual excesses. To live above this world, to despise the tempting glories of it, is a virtue only while we live in it, and are tempted by it ; to have our conversation in heaven, which is the most divine temper of mind, is a gospel grace, only while we live in this world, at a great distance from heaven ; to be contented in all conditions, to trust God in the greatest dangers, to suffer patiently for righteousness' sake, &c. I need not tell you, are virtues proper only for this world, for there can be no exercise for them in heaven, unless we can think it a virtue to be patient and contented with the happiness and glory of that blessed place.

Thus most of the sins, which the gospel forbids under the penalty of eternal damnation, can be committed by us only in this world, and in these bodies ; such as fornication, adultery, uncleanness, rioting drunkenness, injustice, murder, theft, oppression of the poor and fatherless, earthly pride and ambition, covetousness, a fond idolatry of this world, disobedience, to parents and governors, &c. Now if these be the things, for which men shall be saved or damned, it is certain that men must be saved or damned only for what they do in this life.

Bad men who are fond of this world, and bodily pleasures, which makes them impatient of the severe restraints of religion, complain very much of this ; that their eternal happiness or misery depends upon such a short and uncertain life ; that they must spend this life under the awe and terror of the next ; that some few momentary pleasures must be punished with endless misery ; and that if they out-slip their time of repentance, if they venture to sin on too long, or die a little too soon, there is no remedy for them for ever.

But let bad men look to this, and consider the folly of their choice ; I am sure, how hard soever it may be thought, to be eternally damned for the short pleasures of sin, no man can reasonably think it a hard condition of eternal salvation to spend a short life in the service of God : and if we will allow, that God may justly require our services and obedience for so great a reward as heaven is, where can we do him this service, but on earth ? If a corrupt nature must be cleansed and purified, if an earthly nature must be spiritualized and refined before it can be fit to live in heaven, where can this be done but on earth, while we live in these bodies of flesh, and are encompassed with sensible objects ? This is the time for a divine soul, which aspires after immortality, to raise itself above the body, to conquer this present world, by the belief and hope of unseen things ; to awaken and exercise its spiritual powers and faculties, and to adorn itself with those graces and virtues, which come down from heaven, and by the mercies of God, and the merits of our Savior, will carry us up thither. There is no middle state, between living in this body, and out of it ; and therefore whatever habits and dispositions of mind are necessary to make a spirit happy, when it goes out of this body, must be formed and exercised while it is in it ; earth and heaven are two extremes, and opposite states of life, and therefore it is impossible immediately to pass from one to the other ; a soul, which is wholly sensualized by living in the body, if it be turned out of the body without any change, cannot ascend into heaven, which is a state of perfect purity ; for in all reason, the place and state of life must be fitted to the nature of things ; and therefore a life of holiness, while we live in these bodies, is a kind of middle state, between earth and heaven ; such a man belongs to both worlds ; he is united to this world by his body, which is made of earth, and feels the impression of sensible objects ; but his heart and affections are in heaven : by faith he contemp'ates those invisible glories, and feels and relishes the pleasures of a heavenly life ; and he who has his conversation in heaven, while he lives in this body, is ready prepared and fitted to ascend thither, when he goes out of it : he passes from earth to heaven, through the middle region (if I may so speak) of a holy and divine life.

Besides this, it was necessary to the happiness and good government of this present world, that future rewards or punishments should have relation to the good or evil which we do in this life. This in many cases lays restraints upon the lusts and passions of men, when the rods and axes of princes cannot reach them; it over-awes them with invisible terrors, and makes a guilty conscience its own judge and tormentor; it sours all the pleasures of sin, stuffs the adulterer's pillow with thorns, and mingles gall and wormwood with the drunkard's cups; it governs those, who are under no other government, whose boldness and uncontrollable power gives them opportunity of doing what mischief they please, and gives them impunity in doing it: but the most lawless tyrants, who fear no other power, yet feel the invisible restraints of conscience, and those secret and severe rebukes, which make them tremble: nay, many times the fear of the other world governs those, whom no present evil or punishment could govern: men who would venture whatever they could suffer in this life by their sins, are yet afraid of hell, and dare not venture that: those who would venture being sick after a debauch, who would venture to sacrifice their bodies, their estates, their reputation, in the service of their lusts, who are contented to take their fortune at the gallows, or at the whipping-post, yet dare not venture lakes of fire and brimstone, the worm that never dieth, and the fire that never goeth out.

Thus on the other hand, how much is it for the present happiness of the world, that men should live in the practice of those christian graces and virtues, which no human laws command, and the neglect of which, no human laws will punish? as to instance only in the love of enemies, and forgiveness of injuries, and such an universal charity, as does all the good it can to all men. I need not prove, that the exercise of these virtues is for the good of the world, or that no human laws require the exercise of them, in such noble measures and degrees, as the gospel does.

The laws of the land allow scope enough to satisfy the most revengeful man, who will use all the extremities, and all the vexatious arts of prosecution, unless nothing will satisfy his revenge, but blood and a speedy execution; for the laws ought to punish those injuries which a good christian ought to forgive; and then some men may be undone by legal revenge, and others damned for taking it. If no man should do any good offices for others, but what the law commands, there would be very little good done in the world; for laws are principally intended for the preservation of justice, but the acts of a generous and bountiful charity are free: and men may be as charitable as the law requires, without any degree of that divine charity, which will carry them to heaven. Nothing, but the hopes and fears of the next world can enforce these duties on us; and this justifies the wisdom and goodness of God, in making the present exercise of these virtues necessary to our future rewards. I shall only add, that whatever complaints bad men may make, that their future happiness or misery depends upon the government and conduct of their lives in this world, I am sure all mankind would have had great reason to complain, if it had been otherwise : for how miserable must it have made us, to have certainly known, that we must be eternally happy, or eternally miserable in the next world, and not to have as certainly known how to escape the miseries, and obtain the happiness of it ? And how could that be possibly known, if the trial of it had been reserved for an unknown state ? What a terrible thing had it been to die, could no man have been sure what would have become of him in the next world, as no man could have been upon this supposal ! for how can any man know what his reward shall be, when he is so far from having done his work, that he knows not what he has to do, till he comes into the next world ?

But now since we shall be rewarded according to what we have done in this body, every man certainly knows what will make him happy or miserable in the next world ; and it is his own fault, if he do not live so as to secure immortal life ; and what a blessed state is this to have so joyful a prospect beyond the grave, and to put off these bodies with the certain hopes of a glorious resurrection ! This, I think, is sufficient to vindicate the wisdom and goodness of God, in making this present life a state of trial and probation for the happiness of the next. But to proceed :

2. If this life only be our state of trial and probation for eternity, then death, as it puts a final period to this life, so it puts a final end to our work too ; our day of grace, and time of working for another world, ends with this life.

We shall easily apprehend the necessity of this, if we remember, that death, which is the punishment of sin, is not merely the death of the body, but that state of misery to which death translates sinners ; and therefore if we die, while we are in a state of sin, under the curse, and under the power of death, there is no redemption for us, because the justice of God has already seized us : the sentence is already executed, and that is too late to obtain a pardon : for in this case death answers to our casting into prison, from whence we shall never come forth, till we have paid the uttermost farthing, as our Savior represents it, Matth. v. 25, 26. For indeed sin is the death of the soul ; and those who are under the power of sin, are in a state of death ; and if they die before they have a principle of a new life in them, they fall under the power of death, that is, into that state of misery and punishment, which is appointed for such dead souls : and therefore our redemption from death by Christ, is begun in our dying to sin, and walking in newness of life, which is our conformity to the death, and the resurrection of Christ, Rom. vi. 4. This is to be dead to sin, and to be alive to God, as Christ is ; and if we die with Christ, we shall rise with him also into immortal life, which is begun in this world, and will be perfected in the next, which is the sum of St Paul's argument, ver. 6,——11. Thus he tells us, Rom. viii. 10, 11. If Christ be in you, that the body is dead because of sin, but the spirit is life because of righteousness ; that is, our bodies are mortal, and must die, by an irreversible sentence, which God pronounced against Adam, when he had sinned ; but the soul and spirit has a new principle of life, a principle of righteousness and holiness, by which it lives to God, and therefore cannot fall into a state of death, when the body dies ; but if the Spirit of him that raised up christ from the dead, dwell in you ; he that raised up Christ from the dead, shall also quicken your mortal bodies, by his Spirit that dwelleth in you ; that is, when the divine Spirit has quickened our souls, and raised them into a new life, though our bodies must die, yet the same divine Spirit will raise them up also into immortal life

This is the plain account of the matter : if death arrests us while we are in a state of sin and death, we must die for ever : but if our souls are alive to God, by a principle of grace and holiness, before our bodies die, they must live for ever : a dead soul must die with its body ; that is, sink into a state of misery, which is the death, and the loss of the soul : a living soul survives the body in a state of bliss and happiness, and shall receive its body again, glorious and immortal, at the resurrection of the just : but this change of state must be made while we live in these bodies. A dead soul cannot revive in the other world, nor a living soul die there ; and therefore this life is the day of God's grace and patience, the next world is the place of judgment. And the reason St. Peter gives, why God is not hasty in executing judgment, but is long suffering to us ward, is because he is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance, 2 Pet. iii. 5. Hence the apostle to the Hebrews exhorts them, wherefore as the Holy Ghost saith, to day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts, as in the provocation, in the day of temptation in the wilderness, when your fathers tempted me, proved me, and saw my works forty years : wherefore I was grieved with that generation, and said, they do always err in their hearts ; and they have not known my ways. So I swear in my wrath they shall not enter into my rest, Heb. iii. 7,——11.

There is some dispute, what is meant by to-day, whether it be the day of this life, or such a fixed and determined day and season of grace, as may end long before this life : the example of the Israelites, of whom God did swear in his wrath, that they should die in the wilderness, and never enter into his rest, that is, into the land of Canaan, seems to incline it to the latter sense ; for this sentence, they should not enter into his rest, was pronounced against them long before they died ; for which reason they wandered forty years in the wilderness, till all that generation of men were dead ; and if we are concerned in this example, then we also may provoke God to such a degree, that he may pronounce the final sentence on us, that we shall never enter into heaven, long before we leave this world. Our day of grace may have a shorter period than our lives, and we may wander about in this world, as the Israelites did in the wilderness, under an irreversible doom and sentence. And the scope of the apostle's argument seems to require this sense, which is to engage them to a speedy repentance, to-day if you will hear his voice, harden not your hearts : but why to-day ? is it because our lives are uncertain, and we may die before to-morrow ? No ; but lest we provoke God to swear in his wrath, that we shall not enter into his rest.

All men know, that if they die in a state of sin, they must be miserable for ever ; and this is a reason to repent before they die ; but the apostle seems to argue farther, that by their delays and repeated provocations, they may tempt God to shorten their day of grace, and pronounce an irrevocable sentence on them, which leaves no place for repentance ; which elsewhere he enforces from the example of

Esau, who sold his birthright, Heb. xii. 15, 16, 17. Looking diligently, lest any man fail of the grace of God ; lest any root of bitterness springing up, troubles you, and thereby many be defiled ; lest there be any fornicator, or profane person, as Esau, who for one morsel of meat sold his birth-right. For ye know how that afterwards when he would have inherited the blessing, he was rejected : for he found no place for repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears.

The stating of this matter may be thought a digression from my present design, but indeed it is not ; for if by to-day be meant the whole time of this life, that proves that death puts a final period to our day of grace ; and if any shorter period than this life be meant by it, it proves it much stronger ; for if our sentence be passed before we die, it will not be revoked after death. But the stating this question, is a matter of so great consequence to us, that if it were a digression, it were very pardonable ; for many devout minds, when they are disturbed and clouded with melancholy, are afflicted with such thoughts as these, that their day of grace is past, that God has sworn in his wrath, that they shall not enter into his rest ; and therefore their repentance and tears will be as fruitless as Esau's were, which could not obtain the blessing.

Now for the resolving this question, I shall say these three things : 1. That the day of grace, according to the terms of the gospel, is commensurate with our lives. 2. That notwithstanding this, men may shorten their own day of grace, and God may in wrath and justice confirm the sentence. 3. That the reasons for lengthening the day of grace, together with our lives, do not extend to the other world, and therefore death must put a final period to it.

1. That the day of grace, according to the terms of the gospel, is commensurate with our lives ; and there needs no other proof of this, but that the promise of pardon and forgiveness is made to all true penitents, without any limitation of time : whoever believes in Christ, and repents of his sins, he shall be saved ; this is the doctrine of the gospel : and if this be true, then it is certain, that at what time soever a sinner sincerely repenteth of his sins, he shall be saved ; for otherwise some true and sincere penitents, if they repent too late, after the day of grace is expired, shall be damned, and then it is not true, that all sincere penitents shall be saved.

I know but one objection against this from the example of Esau, who having sold his birthright, when afterwards he would have inherited the blessing, was rejected ; for he found no place for repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears. It seems then, that Esau repented too late, and so may we ; his repentance would not be accepted : and if we are concerned in this example, as the apostle intimates we are, then we may repent of our sins when it is too late, and lose the blessing as Esau did.

But this objection is founded on a mistake of Esau's case ; the repentance, here mentioned, is not Esau's repentance, but Isaac's ; that is, when Isaac had blessed Jacob, Esau, with all his tears and importunity, could not make him recal it ; i. e. Isaac would not repent of the blessing he had given to Jacob ; I have blessed him, yea, and he shall be blessed ; Gen. xxvii. 33.

Esau's case then was not, that his repentance came too late to be accepted, but that he could not obtain the blessing, after he had sold his birth-right, to which the blessing was annexed. Now to apply this to the state of christians, that which answers to Esau's birth-right, is their right and title to future glory, being made the sons of God by baptismal regeneration, and faith in Christ ; to sell this birth-right, is to part with our hopes of heaven, for the pleasures, or riches, or honors of this world, as Esau sold his birth-right for one morsel of meat ; that is, as the apostle speaks, to fail of the grace of God, either through unbelief, which he calls the root of bitterness, a renouncing the faith of Christ and returning to Judaism, or Pagan idolatries, or by an impure and wicked life ; lest there be any fornicator, or prophane person, as Esau, who for one morsel of meat sold his birth-right ; i. e. who despises the hopes of heaven, for the sinful pleasures, and transient enjoyments of this world : men, who thus fail of the grace of God, and finally do so, as Esau finally sold his birth-right, when our heavenly Father comes to give his blessing, those great rewards he has promised in his gospel, how importunate soever they shall then be for a blessing, as Esau was, who sought it carefully with tears, they shall find no place for repentance ; God will not alter his purposes and decrees for their sakes. Our Savior has given us a plain comment on this, Mat. vii. 21, 22, 23. Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven ; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. Many will say unto me at that day, that is the day of judgment, when the blessing is to be given, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name cast out devils ? Here is Esau's importunity for the blessing. And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you : depart from me ye that work iniquity. They were prophane Esaus, who had sold their birth-right for a morsel of meat, and now they found no place for repentance : our Lord will not be persuaded by all their importunities to alter his sentence, but depart from me ye that work iniquity.

This example then of Esau does not concern our present case ; it does not prove, that a wicked man, who hath spent the greatest part of his life in sin and folly, shall not be accepted and rewarded by God, if he sincerely repent of his sins, and reform his life ; but it only proves, that a wicked and ungodly chris- tian who prefers the pleasures and enjoyments of this world, before the hopes of heaven, and defiles his soul with impure and worldly lust, what pretences soever he may make to the blessing, or how importunate soever he may be for it, shall receive no blessing from God ; that is, that without holiness no man shall see God, which is the very thing the apostle intended to prove by this example, as you may see, ver. 14.

I grant the case is different, as to churches and nations ; sometimes their day of grace is fixed and determined, beyond which, without repentance, they shall no longer enjoy the light of the gospel. Thus the appearance of Christ in the flesh, and his preaching the gospel to them, was the last trial of Jerusalem, and determined the fate of that beloved city : and therefore when Christ rode into Jerusalem, in order to his crucifixion, when he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it, saying, if thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace ! But now they are hid from thine eyes. For the days shall come upon thee, that thine enemies shall cast a trench about thee, and compass thee round and keep thee in on every side ; and shall lay thee even with the ground, and thy children within thee ; and they shall not leave in thee one stone upon another : because thou knewest not the time of thy visitation, Luke. xix. 41, &c. And this our Savior warned them of before, John, xii. 35, 36.

Yet a little while is the light with you : walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you : for he that walketh in darkness, knoweth not whither he goeth. While ye have light, believe in the light, that ye may be the children of light : which signifies, that unless they believed on him, while he was with them, they must be utterly destroyed ; the kingdom of God should be taken from them, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof ; as he proves by the parable of the householder who planted a vineyard, Matth. xxi, &c.

And this was in some measure the case of the seven churches of Asia, to whom St. John directed his epistles, to summon them to repentance, and to threaten them with the removal of the candlestick, if they did not repent. The judgments of God in the overthrow of some flourishing churches, and in transplanting the gospel from one nation to another, are very mysterious and unsearchable ; but as for particular persons, who enjoy the light of the gospel, unless they shorten their day of grace themselves, God does not shorten it : as long as they live in this world, they are capable of grace and mercy, if they truly repent.

2. Men may shorten their own day of grace ; not by shortening the time of grace and mercy, for that lasts as long as this life does, but by out-living the possibility of repentance ; and when they are past repentance, their day of grace is at an end, and this may be much shorter than their lives : that is, men may so harden themselves in sin, as to make their repentance morally impossible, and God in his just and righteous judgments may give up such men to a state of hardness and impenitence.

Every degree of love to sin, proportionably enslaves men to the practice of it ; makes repentance as uneasy and difficult, as it is to pluck out a right eye, and cut off a right hand, Matth. v. 29, 30. as painful as dying, as crucifying the flesh with its afflictions and lusts, which few men will submit to, Rom. viii. 13. Col. iii. 5.

A habit and custom of sin turns into nature, and is as difficultly altered as nature, is. Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the Leopard his spots ; then may you also do good, who are accustomed to do evil, Jer. xiii, 23.

Some sins are of such a hardening nature, that few men, who are once entangled by them, can ever break the snare : such as adultery, or the love of strange women, of whom Solomon tells us, her house inclineth unto death, and her paths unto the dead : none that go unto her return again ; neither take they hold of the paths of life ; Prov. ii. 18, 19.

Covetiousness is such another hardening sin, that our Savior tells us, It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into heaven : those who love, and those who trust in their riches, Matth. xiii. 23, 24, 25.

Those who have been once enlightened, and fall back again into infidelity ; who have been instructed in the reasons of faith, and the motives of obedience, who have had the heavenly seed of God's word sown in their hearts, but have not brought forth the fruits of it, are near the curse of barren ground, which drinketh in the dews and rain of heaven, and " brings forth briars and thorns, which is rejected, and nigh unto cursing, whose end is to be burnt," Heb. vi. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8.

When men obstinately resist the perpetual motions and solicitations of the holy spirit, he withdraws from them, and gives them up to their own counsels, as we leave off persuading those who will not be persuaded.

When the spirit of God forsakes such men, the evil spirit seizes them, that spirit which ruleth in the children of disobedience. Eph. ii. 3. For the world is divided into the kingdom of darkness and the kingdom of light, Col. i. 13, and those who are not under the government of the divine spirit, are led captive by the devil at his will, 2 Tim. ii. 6. And therefore our Savior hath taught us to pray to be delivered from evil, ἀπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ from the evil one, that is, from the devil : for that is a hopeless state, when God gives us up to the government of evil spirits : nay, when men harden themselves in sin, they are rejected by the good providence of God, which secures good men from, or delivers them out of temptations, as our Savior has taught us to pray, Lead us not into temptation; as a father keeps a watchful eye over a dutiful child, to preserve him from any harm, and to chuse the most proper condition and circumstances of life for him, but suffers a prodigal to go where he pleases, and undo himself as fast as he can. And whoever considers the weakness and folly of human nature, and the power of temptations, must needs conclude that man given up to ruin, who is rejected by the good spirit of God, and cast out of the care of his providence.

Into this miserable state men may bring themselves by sin, who, though it does not make them incapable of mercy, if they do repent, yet it makes it morally impossible that they should repent. It is this the apostle to the Hebrews warns them against, from the example of the hardness and infidelity of the Israelites in the wilderness, of whom God sware, that they should not enter into his rest; as appears from the application he himself makes of it, Heb. iii. 12, 13. "Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God: but exhort one another daily, while it is called to-day; lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin."

This is a plain account of that great question, concerning the length of the day of grace: men may out-live the time of repentance, may so harden themselves in sin, as to make their repentance morally impossible ; but they cannot out-live the mercies of God to true penitents : this is reason enough to discourage men from delaying their repentance, and indulging themselves in a vicious course of life, lest they should be hardened by the deceitfulness of sin, and should be forsaken by God ; but it is no reason to discourage true penitents from trusting in the mercy of God, how late soever their repentance be ; for while we live in this world, the door of grace and mercy is not shut against true penitents.

3. But yet the reasons of lengthening the day of grace and mercy, do not reach beyond this life : this sufficiently appears from what I have already said ; and for a further confirmation of it, I shall add but this one comprehensive reason, viz. That the grace of the gospel is confined to the church on earth, and therefore this life is the only time to obtain the remission of our sins, and a title to future glory : we shall be finally absolved from all our sins, and rewarded with eternal life at that day of judgment ; but we must sue out our pardon, and make our calling and election sure in this world.

The gospel of Christ, which is the gospel of grace, and contains the promises of pardon and immortal life, is preached only to them on earth, and concerns none else.

For this reason Christ became man, cloathed with flesh and blood as we are, that he might be the Savior of mankind ; which he need not have done, had not their salvation been to be wrought in this world ; for could they have been saved in the next, his grace might have met them soon enough there : and therefore, at the birth of our Savior, the angels sang, Glory be to God in the highest ; on earth peace, good will towards men, Luke. ii. 14.

The sacrifice of Christ upon the cross (as well as Jewish sacrifices, which were types of the sacrifice of the cross, were) was offered for the expiation of the sins of living men, or at least considered as living, not of the dead.

He carried his blood into heaven (as the high-priest did the blood of the sacrifice into the holy of holies) there to make expiation, and to intercede for us ; but this intercession, though made in heaven, relates only to men on earth, as his sacrifice did : the earthly tabernacle was a type of the church on earth, and that only, and the worshippers in it, were expiated by sacrifices.

There are two sacraments whereby the grace of the gospel is applied to us, and which are the ordinary means of salvation, baptism and the Lord's Supper, and they are confined to the church on earth ; and if they have not their effect here, they cannot have it in the next world : these unite us to Christ, as members of his body ; and then the holy spirit, which animates the body of Christ, takes possession of us, renews and sanctifies us ; but if we prove dead and barren branches in this spiritual vine ;

if the censures of the church do not cut us off from the body of Christ, death will, and then we can never be re-united to him, nor saved by him in the next world. Faith in Christ, and repentance from dead works, are the great gospel terms of pardon and salvation, and these are confined to this world : there may be something like them in the next world ; such a faith as makes the devils tremble ; such a repentance as is nothing else but despairing agonies, and a hopeless and tormenting remorse ; but such a faith as purifies the heart, as conquers this present world, as brings forth the fruits of righteousness ; such a repentance as reforms our lives, as undoes all our past sins, as redresses the injuries we have done to our neighbors, and the scandal we have given to the world ; such a faith, and such a repentance, which alone are the true christian graces of faith and repentance, are proper only in this life, and can be exercised only in this life, while we have this world to conquer, and the flesh to subdue to the spirit, while we can restore our ill-gotton riches, and set a visible example of piety and virtue.

From hence it is very evident, that no man, who dies in a state of sin and impenitence, can be saved by Christ, and by the grace of the gospel in the next world, for the whole ministration of gospel grace is confined to this life, and if they cannot be saved by Christ, I know no other name whereby they can be saved : and thus death puts an end to all the flattering hopes of sinners.

3. Now if this life be our only state of trial and probation of eternity ; if death puts a final end to our day of grace, and the time of working, then death must translate us to an immutable and unchangeable state. By this I do not mean, that as soon we go out of these bodies, our souls will immediately be as happy, or miserable, as ever they shall be ; the perfect rewards of good men are reserved for the day of judgment, as the final punishments of bad men are ; when our Lord “ shall say to those on his right hand, “ come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world :” and “ to them on the left hand, go ye “ cursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil “ and his angels,” Matth. xxv, 34, 41.

But though the happiness or miseries of the next world may increase, yet the state can never alter ; that is, if we die in a state of grace and favor with God, we shall always continue so ; if we die in a state of sin under the wrath and displeasure of God, there is no altering our state in the other world ; we must abide under his wrath for ever. This is the necessary consequence of what I have already said, which all aimed at this point, that once dying puts us into an immutable and unchangeable state : and therefore I shall wave any further proof of this, and only desire you seriously to consider of it.

1. Now first, since death puts an end to our day of grace, and determines our final state for ever, and this death comes but once, all men must confess of what mighty consequence it is to die well, that death may find us well disposed, and well prepared for another world. Men use their utmost prudence and caution in doing that, which can be done but once for their whole lives, especially if the happiness of their whole lives depends on it ; for no error can be corrected in what is to be done but once ; and certainly we have much more reason to prepare to die once, which translates us to an immutable state of happiness or misery. This ought to be the work and business of our whole lives to prepare for death which comes but once, but that once is for eternity. What unpardonable folly is it, for any man to be surprized by death ! To fall into the grave without thinking of it ! To commit a mistake, which may be retrieved again, to be guilty of some neglect and inadvertency, when the hurt we suffer by it, may be repaired by future diligence and caution, is much more excusable, because it is not so fatal and irreparable a folly : in this case experience may teach wisdom, and wisdom is a good purchase, though we may pay dear for it : but a wise man will use great caution in making an experiment, which if it fail, will cost him his life, because that can never be tried a second time ; and experience is of no use in such things, as can be done but once.

And this is the case of dying ; we can die but once, and if we miscarry that once, we are undone forever :

and what considering man would make such dangerous experiments, as sinners do every day, when their souls are the price of the experiment ! Who would try how long he may sin on safely without thinking of death or judgment ? Whether death will give him timely notice to repent ? Or whether God will give him grace to repent, if it does ? Who would venture the infinite hazards of a death-bed repentance ? Whether after a long life of sin and wickedness, a few distracted, confused, and almost despairing sighs and groans will carry him to heaven ? If such bold adventurers as these, when they have discovered their mistake and folly, could return back into this world, and live over their lives again, the hazard were not so great : but this is an experiment not to be twice made : if they sin on, till they harden themselves in sin, and are forsaken of the grace of God ; if death comes long before they expected, and cut them off by surprise, and without warning ; if their dying and despairing agonies and horrors should not prove a true godly sorrow, not that repentance to salvation never to be repented of ; they are lost to eternity : and what wise man would expose his soul to such a hazard as this ? Who would not take care to make his calling and election sure, before death comes, and in a matter of such infinite concern, wherein one miscarriage is irreparable, to prevent the danger at a distance ?

We hence learn how necessary it is for those who begin well, to persevere unto the end : it is the conclusion of our lives, which determines our future state ; as God expressly tells us by his prophet Ezekiel, Ezek. xviii. 21,——24. “ If the wicked “ will turn from all his sins that he hath committed,
“ and keep my statutes, and do that which is lawful
“ and right, he shall surely live, he shall not die :
“ all his transgressions that he hath committed, they “ shall not be mentioned unto him ; in his righteousness that he hath done, he shall live.——But when “ the righteous turneth away from his righteousness, “ and committeth iniquity, and doeth according to all “ the abominations that the wicked man doeth, shall “ he live ? all the righteousness that he hath done, “ shall not be mentioned ; in his trespass that he “ hath trespassed, and in his sin that he hath sinned,
“ in them shall he die.” And throughout the New Testament the reward is promised only to those who continue to the end. And what I have now discoursed gives a plain account of this ; for our whole life is a state of trial and probation, and if we leave off before our work be done, if we stop or run backwards, before we come to the end of our race, we must lose our reward, our crown : the christian life is a state of warfare, and we know the last battle gives the final conquest ; and this cannot be otherwise, because what comes last, undoes what went before : when a wicked man turns from his wickedness, and does good, God in infinite mercy, through the merits and mediation of Christ, will forgive his sins, because he has put them away from him, and undone them by repentance and a new life ; when a righteous man turns from his righteousness and does wickedly, his righteousness shall be forgotten, because he has renounced it, and parted with it, and is a righteous man no longer : now when God comes to judge the world, he will judge men as he then finds them ; he will not inquire what they have been, but what they are ; he will not condemn a righteous man, because he has been wicked, nor justify a wicked man, because he has been righteous ; for this would be to punish the righteous, and to reward the wicked : such as we are when we die, such we shall continue for ever ; and therefore it is the last scene of our lives, which determines our future state.

And should not this make us very jealous and watchful over ourselves ? To “ take heed, lest there “ be in any of us an evil heart of unbelief, in departing from the living God,” Heb. iii. 12. “ Looking “ diligently, lest any man fail of the grace of God ; “ lest any root of bitterness springing up, trouble “ you, and thereby many be defiled ;” ver. 15. lest “ after we have escaped the pollutions of the world, “ through the knowledge of the Lord and Savior “ Jesus Christ, we are again entangled therein, and “ overcome, and it happen to us according to the “ true proverb, the dog is turned to his vomit again ;

“ and the sow that was washed, to her wallowing in “ the mire.” 2 Pet. ii. 20, 22. This, as the same apostle tells us, “ makes our latter end worse than the “ beginning; for it had been better for us not to have “ known the way of righteousness, than after we have “ known it, to turn from the holy commandment delivered to us.”

Let those consider this, who have been blessed with a religious education, and trained up in the exercises of piety and virtue; who have preserved themselves from the pollutions of youthful lusts, and spent their vigorous age in the service of God; can you be contented to lose all these hopeful beginnings? To lose all your triumphs and victories over the flesh? When you have out-rode all the storms and hurricanes of a tempting world for so many years, will you suffer yourselves to be shipwrecked in the haven? When you are come within view of the promised land, will you suffer your hearts then to fail you? Will you then murmur and rebel against God, and die in the wilderness?

There has been a very warm dispute about the perseverance of saints, whether those who are once in a state of grace, shall always continue so? I will not undertake to decide this controversy; but thus much I will say, (and that I think is all that is needful for a christian to know about it) that to be in a state of grace is to have inward principle of holiness, which brings forth the fruits of a holy life; that to persevere in a state of grace, is to persevere in the practice of holiness and virtue ; that many who have begun well, and have thought themselves, and have been thought by others, to be truly good men, have afterwards been overcome by the temptations of the world, and defiled themselves with the impure lusts of it ; that if such men ever were good men, and in a state of grace, they fall from grace when they forsake the paths of holiness ; and that those who do thus fall away, who after promising beginnings, do all the abominations of the wicked, and live and die in such a state, shall never enter into heaven : we shall receive our final doom and sentence according to that state and condition in which death finds us. What is said upon another account, that we must call no man happy before death, is true in this sense ; no man is a conqueror, but he who dies so : those men deceive themselves, who confidently pretend to be still in a state of grace and favor with God, because formerly they were good men, though now they are grown very bad : this is to persevere in a state of favor with God, without persevering in holiness, which overthrows the gospel of our Savior, and will miserably deceive those men, who have no better foundation for their hopes.

3. We hence learn how dangerous it is to die in an actual commission of any known and wilful sin : such men go into the other world, and go to judgment with actual guilt upon them, they die in their sins ; for they could not repent of them before they died, because they died in the commission of them, and there is no repentance, and therefore no pardon in the next world. This has been, and very often is, the miserable, and I fear the hopeless state of a great many sinners. How many are there, who not only drink themselves into a fever, which takes some time to kill them, and gives them some time to repent of their sin, and to ask God's pardon, but drink themselves dead, or which is much at one, as to this case, drink away their reason and senses, and then fall from their horses, or down a precipice, and perish by some evil accident ; or when they are inflamed with wine ; forget their old friendships, and fall by each other's hands ? How many others have perished in the very act of adultery, or which is much the same, in quarrelling for a strumpet, in the rage and fury of lust ? How many die in the very act of theft and robbery ? All such men receive the present punishment of their sins in this world, and carry the unrepented guilt of them into the next ; and if men shall be damned, who die in their sins without repentance, such men's condition is desperate. And this may be the case of any man who ventures upon a wilful sin ; he may die in the very act of it, and then his repentance will come too late in the next world : and this so often happens, that no wise man would venture his soul upon it.

But there are two sins especially, which this consideration should deter men from, viz. Duelling and self-murder.

When men have such a resentment of affronts and injuries, as to revenge themselves with their swords, and either to thirst after each other's blood, or at least to stake their lives, and to venture killing or being killed, to decide the quarrel : these men have the hearts of murderers, who would kill if they could ; or at least will venture killing their brother to appease their resentments or revenge, which is a mortal and a murdering revenge, whether it murder or not : and therefore if such men fall in the quarrel, as many do, without time to ask God's pardon with their last breath, they die under the guilt of murder unrepented of ; though they do not kill, but are killed, yet they die with murderous intentions, with a mortal hatred and revenge, for they would have killed, if they could ; and St. John tells us, He that hateth his brother, is a murderer ; and we know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him, 1 John, iii. 15. So that these duellers do not only venture their lives, but their souls too, if they fall in the quarrel ; and how little soever they value their lives, it is a little too much to pawn their souls upon a point of honor.

As for self-murder, if we will allow it to be a sin, it is certain that no man who commits it, can repent of it in this world, and there is no pardon for sins in the next world, which are not repented of in this. And yet why we should not think it as great a sin to murder ourselves, as to murder our brother, I cannot imagine, for it has all the marks of a very great sin upon it.

It is as much murder to kill ourselves, as it is to kill another man ; and therefore it is a breach of the sixth commandment, Thou shalt not kill. The reason against murder is the same, For in the image of God made he man, Gen. xi. 6. and he who kills himself, destroys God's image, as much as he who kills another man. The more unnatural the sin is, or the greater obligations we have to preserve the life of the person whom we kill, the greater the sin is. To murder a kind friend, and a benefactor, is a greater evil than to murder a stranger ; to murder a parent or a child, a wife or a husband, is still a greater evil, because they are so much nearer ourselves ; and if the nearness of the relation increases the sin, nobody is so near to us as ourselves, and therefore there is no such unnatural murder as this.

The excuses which are made for self-murder, will not justify the murder of any other man in the world ; though we should see a friend whom we love like ourselves, laboring under intolerable pains, or insupportable misfortunes and calamities of life ; though he should importune and beseech us to put an end to his suffering, by putting an end to a miserable life ; though out of great kindness and compassion we heartily desire to follow him to his grave, yet we must not kill him ; neither the laws of God nor man will allow this : and yet if self-love be the measure of our love to other men, and will justify self-murder, when we are grown weary of life, when we either despise the world, or think it best to make our escape out of it, I cannot imagine, why we may not do the same kindness for a friend or a brother, when he desires it, as we may do for ourselves ; the reason is the same in both, and if it will not justify both, it can justify neither.

For there is no foundation, that I know of, for what some pretend, that God has given us greater power over our own lives, than over other men's : we find no such power given us in scripture, which is the only revelation of God's will ; and I am sure nature teaches us no such thing ; nay, nature teaches quite the contrary ; the natural aversion to death, and the natural principle of self-preservation, were not only intended to make us cautious of any hurt or mischief which other men may do us, but to make us careful to do no hurt to, much less to destroy ourselves ; and therefore the voice of nature is, that we must preserve our own lives and being.

When God made us, he did not make us the absolute lords and masters of ourselves ; we cannot dispose of ourselves as we please, but are his creatures and subjects, and must receive laws from him, and that in such instances, wherein the injury is done only to ourselves ; we must not abuse our own bodies by intemperance, and luxury, or lust, though neither the public, nor any private persons are injured by it ; and if we have not power over our own bodies in lesser instances, much less to kill them.

And if it be a sin to destroy our own lives, it is the most mortal and damning sin, for it destroys soul and body together, because it makes our repentance impossible, unless men can repent of their sin, and obtain God's pardon for it, before they had committed it, or can repent and obtain their pardon in the next world. Did men seriously consider this, it is impossible, that the greatest shame and infamy, want or suffering, or whatever it is, that makes them weary of life, should be thought so intolerable, as to make them force their passage into the other world, to escape it, when such an unnatural escape will cost them their souls : men may be in such evil circumstances as make death desirable ; but no considering man will exchange the sufferings of this life, for the endless miseries of the next : if we cannot destroy our lives, and put an end to our present sufferings, without destroying our souls too, we must be contented to live on, and bear our lot patiently in this world, which, whatever it is, is much more easy and tolerable than to be eternally miserable.

And yet God forbid, that I should pronounce a final and peremptory sentence upon all those unfortunate persons, who have died by their own hands : we know not what allowances God may make for some men's opinions of the lawfulness of it : and for the distraction of other men's thoughts and passions through a settled melancholy, or some violent temptation : my business is not to limit the sovereign and prerogative grace of God, but to declare the nature of the thing according to the terms of the gospel : to murder ourselves, is the most unnatural murder : it is a damning sin, and such a sin as no man can repent of in this world, and therefore unless God forgive it without repentance, it can never be forgiven ; and the gospel of Christ gives us no commission to preach forgiveness of sin, without repentance ; the gospel grace, which only forgives penitents, cannot save such men ; and he is a very bold man, and ventures very far upon unpromised and uncovenanted mercy, who will commit a sin, which the grace of the gospel cannot pardon.

And all that I have to add under this head, is the case of those who die in despair of God's mercy : this is commonly thought a very hopeless state ; for to despair of the mercy of God, is a great sin, and therefore such men die in the actual commission of sin unrepented of, and by-standers are apt to suspect their despair to be little better than their final doom and sentence ; and yet many times we see men laboring under despair in their last agonies, who have to all outward appearance lived very innocent and virtuous lives ; and it is hard to judge so severely of them, as to think they were secret hypocrites, and that God has finally rejected them, because they pass such a severe judgment upon themselves.

Now, I confess, despair is as uncomfortable a state as any man can die in ; but I cannot think it so fatal and dangerous as some imagine ; for let us consider, what the nature of despair is, and wherein the sinfulness of it consists.

To disbelieve the promises of grace and mercy, made to true penitent sinners by Jesus Christ, is infidelity, not despair : and this indeed is a great and unpardonable sin, for it is to renounce the faith of Christ, and the grace of the gospel ; but this is not what we commonly call despair : such men believe the gospel of Christ, and all the promises of it as firmly as others do ; they do not doubt but God will forgive all true penitents, through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ : and therefore are as true and sincere believers, as those who do not despair ; but their despair is in the application of these promises to themselves ; that is, they fear that they are not within the terms and conditions of gospel grace : that they are not true penitents ; that their day of grace is expired, and now they shall not receive the blessing, though as Esau did, they seek it earnestly with tears ; or it may be, that they are reprobates who have no right to the promises of the gospel.

Now if these men may upon all other accounts be very good christians, but are either oppressed with melancholy, or disturbed with false and mistaken notions of religion, can we think that their melancholy or mistakes, which make them pass so false a judgment upon themselves, shall make God condemn them too, who knows them better than they know themselves? Should a man, who has a delirious fancy accuse himself of theft, or murder, or treason, which he was never guilty of; would a just and righteous judge, who certainly knows, that he is not guilty of these crimes, condemn him, only because he condemns himself? Suppose a man, who is in the right way to heaven, should be persuaded by some travellers he meets, that he has mistaken his way; and upon this he should fall into great horrors and agonies, and give himself for lost; is this man ever the further off of heaven, because he is persuaded that he has mistaken the way?

The false judgments dying men make of themselves, either through enthusiasm, presumption, or despair, shall not determine their final state: men may go to hell with all the triumphs of a deluded fancy, which promises nothing less than eternal glories; and those who go trembling out of this world, may find themselves happily mistaken in the next. It is a wrong notion of justifying faith, which makes men conclude despair to be so damning and unpardonable a sin: if justifying faith, were nothing else but a strong belief and persuasion, that we are justified, there were good reason to conclude despair to be a mortal sin, because it is a direct contradiction to justifying faith : nay, if the justifying act of faith were an actual reliance and recumbency on Christ for salvation, despair must be very mortal, because while men are under these agonies, they do not, they cannot rely on Christ for salvation ; for they believe that Christ has cast them off, and will not save them : but if to believe in Christ, that he is the Savior of the world, that he has made expiation for our sins, and intercedes for us at the right hand of God, and is able to save to the uttermost all those that come unto God by him ; that he will save all true penitent sinners, and will save us, if we be true penitents ; I say, if such a faith as this when it brings forth the genuine fruits of repentance and a holy life, be a true justifying faith, this is consistent with the blackest despair ; and then men may be in a justified state, though they are never so strongly persuaded that they are reprobates : a very good man may have his fancy disturbed, and may pass a false judgment upon himself ; but this is no reason for God to condemn him, no more than God will justify a presuming and enthusiastic hypocrite, because he justifies himself.

4. If death puts a final end to our work and labor, and shuts up our accounts, then it concerns us to do all the good that we can while we live : whatever our hand findeth to do, we should do it with all our might, seeing there is no wisdom, nor knowledge, nor work- ing in the grave, whither we are hastening. Not that the next world is an idle and inactive state, where we shall know nothing, and have nothing to do ; but death puts an end to our working for the other ; nothing can be brought to our account at the day of judgment, but the good we do while we live here : for this only we shall receive our reward, proportionably to the increase and wise improvement of our talents.

And is not this a good reason why we should begin to serve God betimes, and to take all opportunities of doing good, since we have only a short life to work in for eternity ? There are great and glorious rewards prepared for good men, but those shall have the brightest crowns, who do the most good in the world ; who are rich in good works, and lay up for themselves treasures in heaven.

Indeed the meanest place in heaven is a happiness too great for us to conceive, I am sure much greater than our greatest deserts ; but since our bountiful Lord will reward all the good service we do, why should we neglect doing any good, when such neglects will lessen our reward ? Why should we be contented to lose any degrees of glory ? This is a holy ambition, to be as good, and to be as happy as God can make us.

This is never thought of by those men who have no greater designs than to escape hell ; but as for the glories of heaven, they can be contented with the least share of them. No man will ever get to heaven, who so despises the glories of it : and if a late repentance should open our eyes, not only to see our sins, but to alter our opinions of this world and of the next, yet we can never recal our past time, and that little time that remains, which is the very dregs and sediment of our lives, the dead and inactive scene, will minister very few opportunities of doing good ; and if it did, we are capable of doing very little ; and if we get to heaven, that will be all : but the bright triumphant crowns shall be bestowed upon those who have improved their time and their talents better.

It is the good we do, while we live, that shall be rewarded ; and therefore we must take care to do good while we live. It is well when men who do no good while they live, will remember to do some good when they die. But if God should accept such presents as these, yet it will make great abatements in the account, that they kept their riches themselves as long as they could, and would part with nothing to God, till they could keep it no longer ; it is not the gift, but the mind of the giver, that is accepted. Under the gospel, God is pleased with a living sacrifice ; but the offerings of the dead (and such these testamentary charities are, which are intended to have no effect as long as we live) are no better than dead sacrifices ; and it may be questioned, whether they will be brought into the account of our lives, if we do no good while we lived : the case is different as to those who did all the good they could while they lived, and when they saw they could live no longer, took care to do good after death ; such surviving charities as these prolong our lives, and add daily to our account ; when such men are removed into the other world, they are doing good in this world still, they have a stock a going below, the increase and improvements of which will follow them into the other world : men who have been charitable all their lives, may prolong their charity after death, and this will be brought to the account of their lives ; but I cannot see how a charity which commences after death, can be called doing good while we live ; and then it cannot belong to the account of our lives : all that can be said for it is this, that they make their wills, whereby they bequeath these charities, while they live, and therefore their bequeathing these charities is an act of their lives ; but they never intend they shall take place while they live, but after their death : and when they never intended their charity to be an act of their lives, I know not why God should account it so. These death-bed charities are too like a death-bed repentance, men seem to give their estates to God and the poor, just as they part with their sins, when they can keep them no longer : this is much such a charity, as it is devotion to bequeath our dead bodies to the church or chancel, which we would never visit while we lived.

But yet, as I have already intimated, this is the only way to prolong our lives, and to have an encreasing account after death, to lay the foundations of some great good to the world, which shall out-live us ; which like seed sown in the earth, shall spring up, and yield a plentiful harvest, while we sleep sweetly in the dust ; such as, the religious education of our children and families, which may propagate itself in the world, and last many ages after we are dead ; the endowment of public schools and hospitals ; in a word, whatever is for the relief of the necessities, or for the instruction and good government of mankind, when we are gone : to do good while we live, and to lay designs of great good to future generations, will both come into our account ; and this may extend the account of our lives, much beyond the short period of them in this world.

5. If death puts an end to our account, methinks a dying bed is a little of the latest to begin it, for this is to begin just where we must end. The account of our lives is the account of the good or evil we have done while we lived : and what account can a dying man give of this, who has spent his whole life in sin and wickedness ? If he must be judged according to what he hath done in the body, how sad is his account, and how impossible is it for him to mend it now ? For when he is just a dying, it is too late for him to begin to live : If without holiness no man shall see God, how hopeless is his condition, who has lived a wicked and profligate life all his days, and is now past living, and therefore past living a holy life ? A man who is confined to a sick and dying bed, is incapable of exercising the virtues of life ; his time of work is over, almost as perfectly over, as if he were dead ; and therefore his account is finished, and he must expect his reward according to what he has already done.

No you'll say, he may still repent of his sins, and a true penitent shall find mercy even at his last gasp. Now I readily grant, that all true penitents shall be saved, whensoever they truly repent ; but it is hard to think, that any dying sorrows, or the dying vows and resolutions of sinners, shall be accepted by God for true repentance : the mistakes of this matter are very fatal, and therefore I shall briefly explain it.

In expounding the promises of the gospel, we must take care to reconcile the gospel to itself, and not make one part of it contradict or overthrow another ; now as the gospel promises pardon of sin to true repentance, so it makes holiness of life as necessary a condition of salvation, as true repentance.

Without holiness no man shall see God, Heb. xii. 14. God will render to every man according to his deeds : to them who by patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory, and honor, and immortality, eternal life : but unto them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil ;—but glory, honor, and peace, to every man that worketh good, Rom. ii. 6——10. Be not deceived, God is not mocked ; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap : for he that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption ; but he that soweth to the spirit, sha'l of the spirit reap life everlasting, Gal. vi. 7, 8. The promises of forgiveness to repentance, are not more express than these texts are, which declare that we shall be rewarded according to our works ; and we have as much reason to believe the one as the other : and if we believe the gospel, we must believe them both ; and then repentance and a holy life are both necessary to salvation ; and then the dying sorrows of sinners, who have lived very wicked lives, and are past mending them now, cannot be true saving repentance. If sorrow for sin without a holy life, can carry men to heaven, then I am sure holiness is not necessary, then men may see God without holiness, and then the promises of pardon to repentance (if this dying sorrow be true repentance) overthrows the necessity of a holy life ; the necessity of a holy life contradicts the promises of pardon to such penitents, and then either one or both of them must be false.

To state this matter plainly, and in a few words, we must distinguish between two kinds of repentance : 1. The baptismal repentance ; 2. Repentance upon a relapse, or falling into any known and wilful sin.

I. By baptismal repentance I mean, that repentance which is necessary in adult persons, in order to their receiving christian baptism ; this is the repentance which is most frequently mentioned in the New Testament, and to which the promises of remission and forgiveness is annexed ; this our Savior preached, repent for the kingdom of heaven is at hand, Math. iv. 17. this he gave authority to his apostles to preach, that [repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations, Luk. xxiv. 47. Now this repentance, both as to Jews and Heathens, who embraced the faith of Christ, was a renouncing all their former sins, and false, superstitious, or idolatrous worship ; and this qualified them for baptism, in which they obtained the remission of all their sins in the name of Christ ; and for this reason remission of sins is promised to repentance, because all such penitents are received to baptism, which is the washing of regeneration, which washes away all their sins, and puts them into a state of grace and favor with God ; as St. Peter tells the Jews, repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, Acts. ii. 38. And much to the same purpose, Ananias told St. Paul, Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling on the name of the Lord, Acts. xxii. 16. And I know not any one text in the New Testament, wherein the remission of sins is absolutely promised to repentance, but what must be understood of this baptismal repentance ; and then repentance and remission of sin are inseparably annexed, because such penitents wash away all their sins in baptism, and come pure and undefiled out of that mystical fountain, which is set open for sin and for uncleanness to wash in, and to be clean.

Now, I grant, should any person who comes to baptism rightly qualified and disposed, with a sincere repentance, and stedfast faith in Christ, die soon after he is baptized, before he has time and opportunity to exercise any of the graces of the Christian life ; such a man shall go to heaven without actual holiness : the remission of his sins in baptism, upon his repentance, will save him, though he have not time to bring forth the fruits of repentance in a holy life ; and this is the only case I know of, wherein a penitent can be saved without actual holiness, viz. by baptismal grace and regeneration. Only the primitive church, and I think with very good reason, allowed the same to martyrdom, when it prevented the baptism of young converts, as we know under the pagan persecutions, young converts, who made bold confessions of their faith in Christ, were hurried away to martyrdom, before they had opportunity of being baptized ; but such men were baptized in their own blood, and that supplied the want of water baptism, which they could not have : now in this case also, if martyrdom be instead of baptism, as the primitive church thought it; then had any heathen been converted from a lewd and profligate life to the faith of Christ, and been immediately apprehended, and hauled to martyrdom, before he could either be baptized, or give any other testimony of the reformation of his life and manners, but by dying a martyr, this man also would go to heaven without actual holiness of life, as a baptized penitent, who dies immediately after his baptism, shall.

And this seems to me to give the best account of the case of the penitent thief upon the cross, which one example has encouraged so many sinners to delay their repentance to the last minute, and has destroyed so many souls by such delays. His case seems to be this : it is probable, he had heard of Christ, and the fame of his great miracles before, and that opinion some had of him, that he was that Messias, whom God had promised to send into the world ; for we can hardly think, that any man who lived in those days, should never have heard of Christ, whose fame went through the whole nation : but yet the course of life this thief led, gave him no great curiosity to enquire into such matters, till he was apprehended for robbery, and condemned to die at the same time with Christ ; this extraordinary accident made him more curiously enquire after him, and learn all the circumstances of his apprehension, and trial, and usage, and behavior, and answers, especially when he saw him ; and was to die with him ; and in short, he observed so much as convinced him, that he was the true Messias, though he saw him nailed in so shameful a manner to the cross.

Now if this was his case, (and we must suppose this, or something like it, unless we shall say, that he was miraculously inspired upon the cross with the faith of Christ, without knowing any thing of him before, which has no foundation in the story, and is without any precedent or example ; I say, if this was his case,) according to the principles laid down, we must grant, that if this thief had renounced his wicked course of life, and professed his faith in Christ, and been baptized in his name, though he had immediately suffered upon the cross, he must have gone directly to heaven or paradise, as Christ promised him he should, by virtue of the remission of all his sins in baptism : nay, we must grant farther, that if instead of baptism, he had at that time died a martyr for the profession of his faith in Christ ; this would have supplied the place of baptism, and translated him to paradise : all then that we have to enquire is, whether his confession of Christ upon the cross, might not as well supply the want of water baptism, as martyrdom ; nay, whether it were not equivalent to martyrdom itself, and might not reasonably be accepted by our Savior as such : water baptism he could not have, a martyr he could not die, for he died a malefactor, but he confessed his faith in Christ, when he saw him hanging upon the cross, which was a more glorious act of faith, than to have died upon the cross for him : he confessed Christ when his own disciples fled from him, and when Peter himself denied him, and discovered his glory through the meanest disguise that ever it was concealed under, even in this world ; and why should not this pass for the faith and confession of martyrdom ? And then the thief upon the cross was saved as by baptism ; which is, not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience towards God, 1, Pet. iii, 21, which description of baptism gives us a plain reason, why martyrdom should supply the place of baptism ; and is as good a reason, why the thief's confession of Christ upon the cross should do so.

This example then of the thief upon the cross, is no reasonable encouragement to any baptized christian, to live a wicked life, and delay his repentance till the hour of death, in hopes of being saved at last, as he was ; for he was saved, as new repenting converts are by baptism, not as baptized sinners hope to be, by a death bed sorrow, and remorse of conscience.

And yet this is the only example, which with any shew of reason is alledged to prove the sufficiency of a death bed repentance ; for the parable of the laborers, who were called to work in the vineyard at different hours, some early in the morning, others at the third, the sixth, the eleventh hour of the day, is nothing at all to this purpose : Matth. xx. 1, &c. The several hours of the day in that parable do not signify the several hours of men's lives, but the different ages of the world ; and therefore those laborers, who are called into the vineyard about the eleventh hour of the world, that is, towards the end, or in the last age of the world, might be called at the beginning of their lives, and work on to the end of them ; for the design of that parable is to shew, that the Gentiles, who were called into the vineyard, or received into the church of Christ towards the conclusion of the world, should be admitted to equal privileges and rewards with the Jews, who were God's ancient people, and had been called into the vineyard early in the morning ; which occasioned their murmuring against the good man of the house ; as we know the Jews murmured upon this account ; and nothing more prejudiced them against the gospel of our Savior than that the Gentiles were received into the church without circumcision. The same thing our Savior represents in the parable of the prodigal : the return of the prodigal to his father's house, is the conversion of the Gentiles, who were the younger brother, and had been a great prodigal for many ages : Luke, xv. 13, &c. the elder brother, who always lived at home with his father, was the Jewish church ; but when this young prodigal was received by his father with feasting, and music, and all the expressions of joy ; the elder brother grew jealous of it, and thought himself much injured by his father's fondness, for the returning prodigal, and refused to come in, and bear his part in the solemnity, as the Jews rejected the gospel, because the Gentiles were received into the church.

And that this must be the true meaning of the parable of the laborers, appears from this, that those who were called into the vineyard at the eleventh hour, received a reward equal to those who had borne the heat and burden of the day ; which is agreeable enough, if we expound it of different ages, of the church ; for there is great reason, why the Gentiles, though they came later into the vineyard, should be made at least equal with the Jews, who were God's ancient people ; but if we expound this of entering into the vineyard at different ages of our life, it seems very unequal, that those who begin a life of virtue just at the conclusion of their lives, should be equally rewarded with those who have spent their whole lives in the service of God ; that is, that those who do very little good, shall receive as great a reward as those who do a hundred times as much : which is a direct contradiction to the scope and design of our Savior's parables about the pounds and talents, Matth. xxv. 14, &c. Luke, xix. 12, &c.

But suppose it were to be understood, not of the Jewish and christian church, but of particular christians ; yet their being called to work in the vineyard, at what hour soever it was, though the eleventh hour, was their first admission into the christian church, their first conversion to the faith of Christ, and from this time they labored in the vineyard, lived a holy religious life ; and I readily grant, should a Jew, a Turk, or a Pagan, be converted to christianity in the eleventh hour, in his declining age, and from that time live in obedience to the gospel of Christ, there is no doubt but he shall be greatly rewarded ; but what is this to any of us, who were born of christian parents, baptized in our very infancy, instructed in the christian religion from the very beginning, and have always professed the faith of Christ, but lived like pagans and infidels ! We were not called into the vineyard at the eleventh hour, but early in the morning ; and though men who were called at the last hour, shall be rewarded for that hour's work ; this does not prove, that men who entering into the vineyard in the morning, play or riot away their time, till the eleventh hour, shall receive a day's wages for an hour's work.

But suppose this too, yet it will not answer the case of a death bed repentance ; such men delay not till the eleventh hour, but till night comes, when they can do no work at all ; whereas those who came last into the vineyard, wrought an hour ; now that God in infinite grace and goodness will reward them for one hour's work, does not prove, that he will reward those who do no work, but spend their whole day idly or wickedly, and only ask his pardon for not working at night.

II. But what a fatal cheat these men put upon themselves, will better appear, if we consider the second kind of repentance, which is repentance after baptism, when men have relapsed into the commission of new sins, after they have washed away all their old sins in the laver of regeneration : which is the only notion of repentance concerned in this question ; for such sinners when they come to die, are to repent of a whole life spent in wickedness, after baptism ; and this extremely alters the case ; for though faith and repentance, (as that repentance signifies a sorrow for past sins, and the purpose and resolutions of a new life) be the only conditions of baptismal remission and justification : yet when we are baptized we then covenant with God for an actual obedience, and holiness of life ; to deny all ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world ; and therefore mere repentance, or a sorrow for sin, with the most solemn resolutions and vows of a new life (which is all the repentance dying men can have) cannot, according to the terms of the gospel, be accepted instead of the obedience and holiness of our lives. Had the gospel said, you shall either abstain from all sin, and do good while you live, or repent of all your sins, when you die ; this had been a sufficient encouragement for a death bed repentance ; but when holiness of life is made the necessary condition of seeing God, and the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all unrighteousness and ungodliness of men ; Rom. i. 18. when we are so expressly forewarned, that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God : be not deceived, neither fornicators, nor idolaters, nor adulterers, nor effeminate, nor abusers of themselves with mankind, nor thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God ; 1. Cor. xi. 9, 10. when our Savior expressly tells us, that it is only the doers of the word are blessed ; that not every one that saith Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my father which is in heaven ; Matt. vii. 21. that as for all others, what pretences soever they make, he will profess to them, I never knew you, depart from me ye that work iniquity : I say, whoever after such express declarations as these, can persuade himself, that sorrow for sin, and some good resolutions and fair promises upon a death bed, shall carry him to heaven, though he has done no good in his life, and has been guilty of all, or many of those sins which the gospel has threatened with damnation, makes void the whole gospel of our Savior.

But you will say, is there no place then for repentance under the gospel ? no remission of sins committed after baptism ? God forbid ! For who then could be saved ? Our Savior has taught us to pray every day, forgive us our trespases, as we forgive them that trespass against us ; Matth. xviii. 21, 22. and has taught us to forgive our brother, though he offended against us seventy times seven, in imitation of God's goodness in forgiving us ; and if we must forgive so often, surely God will forgive more than once.

But then repentance after baptism requires not only a sorrow for sin, and some good purposes and resolutions of a new life for the future, but the actual forsaking of sin, and amendment of our lives : in baptism God justifies the ungodly, Rom. viii. 5. that is, how wicked soever men have been, whenever they repent of their sins, renounce their former wicked practices, and believe in Christ, and enter into covenant with him by baptism ; all their former sins are immediately forgiven and washed away, without expecting the actual reformation of their lives ; this was plainly the case both of Jewish and Heathen converts, who upon the profession of faith in Christ, and renouncing their former wicked lives, whatever they had been, were immediately received to baptism ; as St. Peter exhorted the Jews, repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the holy ghost, Acts. ii. 38. And the same day there were three thousand baptized : this is gospel grace, which is the purchase of Christ's blood, that the greatest sinners, upon their repentance and faith in Christ, are received to mercy, and wash away all their sins in baptism ; but when they are in covenant, they shall then be judged according to the terms and conditions of that covenant, which requires the practice of an universal righteousness ; such persons must not expect, as St. Paul reasons, that if they continue still in sin, grace will abound ; the very covenant of grace, which we enter into at baptism, confutes all such ungodly hopes ; For how shall we that are dead in sin, live any longer therein ? Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into his death ; therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death, that like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the father, so we also should walk in newness of life, Rom. vi. 1, 2, 3. 4. This is the difference St. Paul makes between the grace of the gospel in receiving the greatest sinners to baptism, and justifying them by the blood of Christ ; and what the gospel requires of baptized christians to continue in this justified state : in the first case nothing is required but faith, and repentance, upon which account we are, so frequently said to be justified by faith, not by the deeds of the law ; Rom. iii. 20,——24. to be justified freely by his grace, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus ; Rom. i. 5. to be saved by grace through faith ; not of works, lest any man should boast, Eph. ii. 8. 9. And I believe upon inquiry it will be found, that justification by faith always relates to this baptismal justification, when by baptism we are received into the covenant with God, and into a justified state, only for the sake of Christ, and through faith in his blood. Which one thing well considered, would put an end to the disputes about justification, and about faith and works. Which I cannot explain now, but shall only observe, that the constant opposition between justification by the faith of Christ, and justification by circumcision and the works of the law, Gal. v. 2, 3. to the observation of which they were obliged by circumcision, is a manifest proof that justification by faith is our justification by the faith of Christ in baptism, which is our admission into the christian church, makes us the members of Christ, and the children of God, which is a state of grace and justification ; as circumcision formerly made them God's peculiar people in covenant with him, which is the justification of circumcision ; and justification by faith, and justification by circumcision, would not be duly opposed, if they did not relate to the same kind of justification ; that is, that justification which is the immediate effect of our being in covenant with God.

But now, when we are justified by a general repentance and faith in Christ at baptism, we also vow a conformity to the death of Christ, by dying to sin, and walking in newness of life ; that is, we vow an universal obedience to all the laws of righteousness, which the gospel requires of us, as circumcision made them debtors to the whole law, Gal. v. which is the reason why the works of the law, and that evangelical righteousness which the faith of Christ requires of us, are so often opposed in this dispute ; the one, the righteousness of the law, or of works, the other, the righteousness of faith ; and therefore as circumcision could not justify those who transgressed the law, no more will faith justify those who disobey the gospel ; but the righteousness of the law must be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh but after the spirit, Rom. ii. 13, 25, — 29, Rom. viii. 4.

Now the necessary consequence of this is, that mere sorrow for sin, and the mere vows and resolutions of obedience, without actual holiness, and obedience of life, according to the terms and conditions of the gospel ; will not save a baptized Christian ; for mere sorrow for sin, and vows of obedience will be accepted only in baptism ; but when we are baptized, we must put our vows in execution ; or we fall from our baptismal grace and justification : and therefore when we relapse into sin after baptism, no repentance will be accepted, but that which actually reforms our lives ; for baptismal grace is not ordinarily repeated, no more than we can repeat our baptism.

This I take to be the true meaning of that very difficult place, Heb. vi. 4, 5, 6. For it is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the holy Ghost, and have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they shall fall away, to renew them again unto repentance, seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to open shame. This severe passage occasioned some dispute about the canonical authority of this epistle ; for it was thought that the apostle here excluded all men from the benefit of repentance, who fell into sin again after baptism ; but it is certain this is not the apostle's meaning, nor do the words import any such doctrine ; but his meaning is, either that men who have been baptized, and thoroughly instructed in the Christian religion, may sin themselves into an impossibility of repentance, (which is the most ordinary interpretation of the words, and which sense, I gave before of them, and is in part the true sense, though I think not the whole) or that men after baptism may fall into such a state, as nothing can deliver them out of, but baptismal grace and regeneration ; and since baptism cannot be repeated, the state of such men is hopeless and desperate, according to the terms of the gospel, however God may deal with them by a sovereign and prerogative grace : for though we can expect and rely on no other grace, but what God has promised in his gospel, yet God does not absolutely confine himself nor must we confine his grace ; and this he tells us is the case of all apostates from the Christian faith. The understanding of this is necessary to my present purpose ; and therefore I shall briefly explain it :

1. That the apostle here speaks of persons who were baptized, is plain from the words, those who were once enlightened ; the ἀπαξ φωτισθέντας, are those who have been once baptized ; for so φωτίζεν, and φωτισμὸς in the ancient writers signifies baptism, as Justin Martyr himself tells us in his second apology, that baptism is called φωτισμός, or illumination, because their minds are enlightened by it, and being once enlightened, plainly refers it to baptism, which can be administered but once. And what follows, proves this to be the meaning of it ; and have tasted the heavenly gift : that is, saith St. Chrysostom, received remission of sins in baptism ; and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, the holy Spirit being given in baptism : and have tasted of the good word of God, been instructed in the doctrines of the gospel, which in the apostolic age immediately followed baptism : for men were then admitted to baptism immediately upon their profession of repentance and faith in Christ, and were afterwards instructed in the Christian religion ; and the powers of the world to come ; that is, those miraculous gifts and powers which were bestowed on the apostles ; for a confirmation of the faith of Christ, and which most Christians did in some degree or other partake of in baptism. This is a plain description of baptism, with the effects and consequence of it.

2. That he speaks of such as after baptism totally apostatize from the faith of Christ is as plain : for they are παραπεσοντες, those who fall away. From what ? From their Christian profession, which they made at their baptism : that is, who renounce the faith of Christ, and turn Jews or Heathens again ; for these men crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to open shame ; that is, they declare him to be an impostor, as the Jews did when they crucified him, which is as much crucifying him again, and exposing him to public shame and infamy, as they can possibly do. But now this description can relate only to total apostates ; for whatsoever sins professed Christians are guilty of, though thereby they reproach their Lord and Savior, yet they do not declare him to be an impostor, who justly suffered on the cross, and whom they would condemn to the same ignominious death again if they could ; nay, those who are conquered by some powerful and surprizing fears to deny Christ, as Peter did, or to offer sacrifice to idols, as many Christians did under the heathen persecution, and recover themselves again by repentance, are not included in his severe sentence : for such men do really believe in Christ still, do not heartily renounce their baptismal faith, and therefore do not lose their baptism, though in word and deed at present they deny Christ. The case of such men is very dangerous ; for our Savior tells us, Whosoever shall deny me be- fore men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven, Matth. x. 33. Those who through fear of men persist in such a denial, shall not be saved by a secret and dissembled faith : for we must not only believe in Christ, but we must openly profess our faith in him : but such men may be recovered by repentance, and by a bold confession of Christ in new dangers and temptations ; these are lapsed Christians, but not apostates, as Julian was, who hated the name and religion of Christ; and therefore they were admitted to repentance in the Christian church, as not having lost their baptismal faith, though through fear they denied it.

3. Of these total apostates, the apostle tells us, that it is impossible to renew them again unto repentance, ἀνακαίνιζειν εἰς μετένοian, or δια, as St. Chrysostom renders it, to make them new creatures again by baptismal repentance ; for so he tells us, that ἀνακαίνιθῆναι, καινον γενέθαι, that to be renewed is to be made new, which can be done only by baptism, τὸ γὰρ καινὸς ποιεῖται τὰ λυτὰ μόνον ἐν, baptism only makes us new creatures.

The danger then of these men's case, as the apostle represents it, is this ; that they having totally apostatised from the faith of Christ, together with their faith have lost their baptism, and are become Jews and Pagans again ; now Jews and Pagans can never be made christians without baptism, wherein they are regenerated and new made ; and by the same reason these apostatized christians who are become Jews and Pagans, can never become christians again, unless they be re-baptized ; and that they cannot be, because there is but one baptism in the christian church. And therefore though we could suppose, that they should believe again, and repent of their sins, they could never recover a legal right and title to mercy, and the promises of the gospel covenant. Faith and repentance will not justify a heathen without baptism ; for he that believes and is baptized, shall be saved, are the express terms of the covenant ; and therefore the condition of apostates is very hopeless, who are relapsed into such a state, that nothing but being new made, and new born, can save them ; and that they cannot have, for they must not be baptized again. A christian must be but once born, no more than any man is, which possibly is the reason why St. Peter tells us of such apostates, that their latter end is worse with them than their beginning, 2. Pet. ii. 20. For Jews and Heathens, how wicked soever they were, might wash away their sins in baptism ; but such apostates are like a sow that was washed, that returns again to her wallowing in the mire. When they had washed away their sins and infidelity in baptism, they return to their forsaken Paganism again, and lose the effect of their first washing, and there is no second baptismal washing to be had.

The apostle does not say ; that it is impossible those men should be saved, but it is impossible they should be regenerated again by baptism, which is the only gospel state of salvation. If any such men be saved, they must be saved, as I observed, before, by uncovenanted grace and mercy ; they are in the state of unbaptized Jews and Heathens, not of christians, who have a covenant right to God's promises. And I would desire the baptized atheists and infidels of our age to consider of this whose case is so very like this ; if it be not the same, that it would make them afraid of setting up for wits, at such infinite peril of their souls.

To apply this then to our present purpose. What I have now discoursed, plainly shews, that a baptized christian must not always expect to be saved by such grace as saves and justifies in baptism ; baptismal grace is inseparably annexed to baptism, and can be no more repeated than baptism. This makes the case of apostates so desperate, that infidelity can be washed away only in baptism, and those who apostatize after baptism, can never be re-baptized again, and therefore can never have any covenant title to pardon and forgiveness.

And this proportionably holds good in our present case ; the grace of baptism washes away all the sins of our past lives, how many, how great soever they have been, only upon our profession of our faith in Christ, and repentance of all our sins, and vows of obedience to the laws of Christ, for the future : but whoever after baptism lives a wicked and profligate life, and hopes to be saved at last only by faith in Christ, and sorrow for sins, and vows of living better when he is just a dying, will be miserably mistaken ; for this is only the grace of baptism, which can never be repeated, not the rule and measure whereby God will judge baptized christians, who have had time and opportunity of exercising those christian graces which they vowed at their baptism.

A man who retains the faith of Christ, though he lives wickedly, does not forfeit his baptism, but shall be forgiven whenever he repents, and forsakes his sins, and lives a holy life : but if he delays this so long, that he has no time to amend his life, that he can do nothing but be sorry for his sins, and vow a new life ; I cannot promise him that this shall be accepted at the hour of death, because the gospel requires a holy life, not merely a death bed sorrow and remorse for sin. Sorrow for sin, and vows of a new life, will be accepted at baptism, as the beginning of a new life ; but that is no reason why they should be accepted at our death, when they are only the sorrowful conclusion of a wicked life. God will receive us to grace and mercy at baptism, upon our solemn vows of living to him ; but he has no where promised to accept of our dying vows instead of holiness and obedience, as a recompence for a whole life spent in wickedness and folly. It is very seldom that such dying sorrows, or dying vows, are sincere and hearty ; but were they ever so sincere, (as sometimes, though very rarely, we see that men, who recover from a dangerous sickness keep the vows and promises they then made, and this is a good proof that they were very sincere in making them) yet do I not know any one promise in scripture to a dying repentance : the gospel requires actual holiness of life : and when God cuts off such men in their sins without allowing them any time to reform their lives, it is very suspicious that he rejects their sorrows and their vows ; as wisdom threatens, Prov. i. 24, &c. Because I have called, and ye refused ; I have stretched forth my hand, and no man regarded, I will laugh also at your calamity, and mock you when fear cometh. Then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer ; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me. I will not pre-judge the final state of these men ; but if God accept of such a death bed repentance, which cannot produce the actual fruits of righteousness, it is more than he has promised, and more than he has given us authority to preach ; and we should consider what infinite hazard we run by such delays of repentance, that we cannot be saved, by the express terms of the gospel ; but if we be saved, we must be saved by an unpromised and uncovenanted grace and mercy ; which, how good soever God be, we have no reason to rely on. This, I know, will be thought very severe, but I cannot help it ; it may terrify dying sinners, but there is less danger in that than nursing men up in the deluding hopes of a death bed repentance, which renders all the arguments and motives to a holy life ineffectual, and I fear, eternally destroys as many as trust in it.

If you ask, why faith and repentance, without the actual obedience of our lives, should not as well be accepted by God on our death bed, as it is at our baptism? I shall ask another very plain question, why a husbandman who hires laborers into his vineyard in the morning, receives them into his service, protection, and pay, only upon their promise to be faithful and diligent in his work before they have done any thing: I say, when these men have loitered away the day without working, why should not he reward them at night, because they then also profess themselves very sorry that they did not work; and make a great many promises and vows, that if they were to begin the day again they would? A promise of faithfulness and diligence was reason enough why he should take them into his service; but their sorrow for not working, and their resolution of working, when the time of working is past, is no reason why they should be rewarded, or escape the punishment of loiterers.

This is the very case here; we are saved by the mercies of God, and the merits of Christ, which we partake of by our union to him: this union is made in baptism, which incorporates us into the body of Christ; and from the very first moment of our union, we are in a state of grace and justification, our sins are washed away in his blood, as water purges away all bodily defilements, and the spirit of Christ dwells in us to renew and sanctify us : now all that is required by God, or that seems in the nature of the thing necessary to this union, is a general repentance of all our sins, renouncing our former wicked course of life, professing our faith in Christ, as the son of God and Savior of the world, and vowing obedience to his laws ; for this qualifies us to be his disciples, and to be received into his service, and into the communion of his body and church ; and therefore this faith and repentance justifies in baptism, because those who thus repent of their sins, and believe in Christ, are received to baptism, and in baptism, have all their sins forgiven, and are put into a state of grace and favor with God.

But now though faith and repentance, and the vows of obedience, are sufficient to make us the disciples of Christ, and to put us into a state of justification, yet they are not sufficient to save those who are the disciples of Christ, without actual holiness and obedience of life : for to be a disciple of Christ does not signify merely to believe in him, and to vow obedience to him, but to obey him : it is reasonable enough, that upon our vows of obedience, we should be received into his service, but it is not reasonable that we should be rewarded without performing our vows ; for it is as ridiculous a thing to think that our repeated and fruitless resolutions of obeying our Savior, should pass for obedience, as that the son should be thought to do his father's will, who said, I go, sir, but went not ; especially, when after our vow of baptism we live a very ungodly life, and never think it time to repent, and to renew our vows again till we come to die. If we consider the difference between what is necessary to make us the disciples of Christ, and what is required of us when we are disciples, we shall see a plain reason, why faith and repentance, as that signifies sorrow for sin, and vows of obedience, will justify us in baptism, but will not be accepted upon a death bed, after a life spent in wickedness : for when a baptized christian comes to die, he is not then to be made a disciple of Christ, and to be baptized again, but to give an account of his life since he has been Christ's disciple ; and mere faith in Christ, sorrow for sin, and vows of obedience, without actual holiness of life, though with the sacrament of baptism, it will make a disciple, yet it will not pass in a disciple's account, especially when the sum total of his life, is nothing but sin, and sorrow, and fruitless vows ; for this is not that holiness of life, which Christ requires of his disciples.

The ancient discipline of the church was a plain proof of this, that they thought a great deal more necessary for a baptized christian, than was required to qualify men for baptism : in the apostles' days, they baptized both Jews and Heathens immediately upon their profession of faith in Christ, and renouncing their former wicked lives ; but in case they fell into any gross and scandalous sin after baptism, they were cast out of the communion of the church, and the profession of sorrow and repentance for their sins, and the most solemn vows of a new life, was not thought sufficient to restore them to the peace of the church, but they were kept under the severities of repentance, till they had made satisfaction for the scandal they had given to the church, and given sufficient testimonies of the actual reformation of their lives ; and in the ages succeeding the apostles, this state of penitence in some cases was continued many years, in other cases such sinners were never reconciled till the hour of death : now if they had thought, as many among us now do, that sorrow for sin, and the vows of obedience do immediately obtain our pardon from God, for sins committed after baptism, it is not imaginable, why they should have imposed such a long and severe discipline on penitents : if they believed God had forgiven them, why should not the church forgive them, and receive them to her communion again, upon their promises of amendment, without such a long trial of their reformation ? But it is evident they thought sins after baptism not forgiven without actual reformation, and therefore would not receive them to communion again without a tried and visible reformation of their lives. We know what disputes there were about this matter in the primitive church ; the ancient discipline allowed but of one repentance after baptism ; and some would not allow of that in the case of adultery, murder, and idolatry, but denied the authority of the church to receive such sinners to communion again : this was the repentance of Novatus's schism : and Tertullian, after he turned Montanist, said many bitter things against the catholics upon this argument, which seemed to question the validity of repentance itself after baptism, though it did reform men's lives : but though this was a great deal too much, and did both lessen the grace of the gospel, and the authority which Christ had given to his church, yet it is evident that all this time, they were very far from thinking, that some dying vows after a wicked life, would carry men to heaven ; and the judgment of those first and purest ages of the church, ought at least to make men afraid of relying on such a death bed repentance, as they thought very ineffectual to save sinners.

CHAP. IV.

Concerning the fear of death, and the remedies against it.

DEATH is commonly and very truly called the king of terrors, as being the most formidable thing to human nature ; the love of life, and the natural principle of self preservation, begets in all men a natural aversion against death, and this is the natural fear of dying ; this is very much increased by a great fondness and passion for this world, which makes such men, especially while they are happy and prosperous, very unwilling to leave it ; and this is still encreased by a sense of guilt, and the fear of punishment in the next world : all these are of a distinct nature, and require suitable remedies, and therefore I shall distinctly consider them :

I. The natural fear of death results from self preservation and the love of our own being ; for light is sweet and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun, Eccles. xi. 7. All men love life, and the necessary consequence of that is to fear death ; though this is rather a natural instinct, than the effect of reason and discourse.

There are great and wise reasons why God should imprint this aversion to death on human nature, because it obliges us to take care of ourselves, and to avoid every thing which will destroy or shorten our lives ; this in many cases is a great principle of virtue, as it preserves us from all fatal and destructive vices ; it is a great instrument of government, and makes men afraid of committing such villanies, as the laws of their country have made capital ; and therefore since the natural fear of death is of such great advantage to us, we must be contented with it, though it makes the thoughts of dying a little uneasy ; especially if we consider, that when this natural fear of death is not encreased by other cases, (of which more presently) it may be conquered or allayed by reason and wise consideration : for this is not so strong an aversion, but it may be conquered ; the miseries and calamities of this life very often reconcile men to death, and make them passionately desire it : Wherefore is light given to him that is in misery, and life to the bitter in soul ? Which long for death, but it cometh not, and dig for it more than for hid treasures : which rejoice exceedingly, and are glad when they can find the grave, Job. iii. 20,——22. My soul chooseth strangling, and death rather than life : I loathe it, I would not live always ; let me alone, for my days are vanity, Job. vii. 15, 16. And if the sense of present sufferings can conquer the fears of death, there is no doubt but the hope of immortal life may do it also ; for the fear of death, is not an original and primitive passion, but results from the love of ourselves, from the love of life, and our own being ; and therefore when we can separate the fear of death from self love, it is easily conquered : when men are sensible, that life is no kindness to them, but only serves to prolong their misery, they are so far from being afraid of death, that they court it ; and were they as thoroughly convinced, that when they die, death will translate them to a more happy life, it would be as easy a thing to put off these bodies, as to change their clothes, or to leave an old and ruinous house for a more beautiful and convenient habitation.

If we set aside the natural aversion, and enquire into the reasons of this natural fear of death, we can think of but these two ; either men are afraid, that when they die they shall cease to be, or at least they know not what. But now both these reasons of fear are taken away by the revelation of the gospel, which has brought life and immortality to light ; and when the reasons of our fear are gone, such an unaccountable aversion and reluctance to death, signifies little more than to make us patient of living, rather than unwilling to die ; for a man who has such a new glorious world, such a happy immortal life in his view, could not very contentedly delay his removal thither, were not death in the way, which he naturally startles at, and draws back from, though his reason sees nothing frightful or terrible in it.

The plain and short account then of this matter is this : we must not expect wholly to conquer our natural aversion to death ; St. Paul himself did not desire to be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life, 2 Cor. iii. 4. Were there not some remaining aversions to death mixed with our hopes and desires of immortality, martyrdom itself, excepting the patient enduring the shame and the torments of it, would be no virtue ; but though this natural aversion to death cannot be wholly conquered, it may be extremely lessened, and brought next to nothing, by the certain belief and expectation of a glorious immortality ; and therefore the only way to arm ourselves against these natural fears of dying, is to confirm ourselves in this belief, that death dose not put an end to us, that our souls shall survive in a state of bliss and happiness, when our bodies shall rot in their graves, and that these mortal bodies themselves shall, at the sound of the last trump, rise again out of the dust immortal and glorious. A man who believes and expects this, can have no reason to be afraid of death ; nay he has great reason not to fear death ; and that will reconcile him to the thoughts of it, though he trembles a little under the weaknesses and aversions of nature.

II. Besides the natural aversions to death, most men have contracted a great fondness and passion for this world, and that makes them so unwilling to leave it : whatever glorious things they hear of another world, they see what is to be had in this, and they like it so well, that they do not expect to mend themselves, but if they were at their choice, would stay where they are ; and this is a double death to them to be snatched away from their admired enjoyments, and to leave whatever they love and delight in behind them ; and there is no remedy that I know of for these men to cure their fears of death, but only to rectify their opinions of things, to open their eyes to see the vanity of this world, and the brighter and dazling glories of the next.

There are different degrees of this, and therefore this remedy must be differently applied : some men are wholly sunk into flesh and sense, and have no taste at all of rational and manly pleasures, much less of those which are purely intellectual and divine ; they are slaves to their lusts, lay no restraints on their brutish appetites ; the world is their God, and they dote on the riches, and pleasures, and honors of it, as the only real and substantial goods : now these men have great reason to be afraid of death ; for when they go out of this world, they will find nothing that belongs to this world in the next ; and thus their happiness and their lives must end together ; it is fitting they should fear death, for if the fear of death will not cure their fondness for this world, nothing else can ; you must not expect to persuade them that the next world is a happier place than this ; but the best way is to set before them the terrors of the next world ; those lakes of fire and brimstone prepared for the devil and his angels ; to ask them our Savior's question, What shall it profit a man to gain the whole world, and to lose his own soul ; or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul ? These men ought to fear on, till the fear of death cures their vicious passion and fondness for this world, and then the fear of death will by degrees cure itself.

Others there are, who have a true reverence for God, and govern their inclinations and passions to the things of this world with regard to his laws ; they will not raise an estate by injustice, oppression, or perjury ; they will not transgress the rules of sobriety and modesty in the use of sensual pleasures ; they will not purchase the honors and preferments of this world at the price of their souls ; but yet they love this world very well, and are extremely delighted in the enjoyments of it ; they have a plentiful fortune, or a thriving trade, or the favor of their prince ; they live at ease, and think this world a very pleasant place, and are ready to cry, it is good for us to be here : now it cannot be avoided, but that in proportion to men's love of this world, though it be not an immoral and irregular passion, they will be more afraid, and more unwilling to leave it : when we are in the full enjoyment of an earthly felicity, it is difficult for very good men to have such a strong and vigorous sense of the next world as to make them willing and contented to leave this ; they desire to go to heaven, but they are not over hasty in their desires ; they can be better pleased, if God sees fit, to stay here a little longer, and when they find themselves a going, are apt to cast back their eyes upon this world, as those who are loth to part. This makes it so necessary for God to exercise even good men with afflictions and sufferings, to wean them from this world, which is a scene of misery, and to raise their hearts to heaven, where true and unmixed happiness dwells.

The only way then to cure this fear of death, is to mortify all remains of love and affection for this world ; to withdraw ourselves as much as may be from the conversation of it, to use it very sparingly and with great indifferency ; to supply the wants of nature, rather than to enjoy the pleasures of it ; to have our conversation in heaven, to meditate all the glories of that blessed place, to live in this world upon the hopes of unseen things ; to accustom ourselves to the work and to the pleasures of heaven, to praise and adore the great maker and redeemer of the world, to mingle ourselves with the heavenly quire, and possess our very fancies and imaginations with the glory and happiness of seeing God and the blessed Jesus, of dwelling in his immediate presence, of conversing with saints and angels : this is to live like strangers in this world, and like citizens of heaven ; and then it will be as easy to us to leave this world for heaven, as it is for a traveller to leave a foreign country to return home. This is the height and perfection of christian virtue ; it is our mortifying the flesh with its affections and lusts, it is our dying to this world, and living to God ; and when we are dead to this world, the fear of dying and leaving this world is over : for what should a man do in this world, who is dead to it ? When we are alive to God, nothing can be so desirable as to go to him ;

for here we live to God only by faith and hope, but that is the proper place for this divine life, where God dwells : so that in short, a life of faith, as it is our victory over this world, so it is our victory over death too ; it disarms it of all its fears and terrors, it raises our hearts so much above this world, that we are very well pleased to get rid of these bodies which keeps us here, and to leave them in the grave in hopes of a blessed resurrection.

III. the most tormenting fears of death are owing to a sense of guilt, which indeed are rather a fear of judgment than of death, or a fear of death, as it sends us to judgment ; and here we must distinguish between three sorts of men, whose case is very different. 1. Those who are very good men, who have made it the care of their lives to please God, and to save their souls. 2. Those who have lived very ungodly lives, and are now awakened by the approaches of death, to see an angry and provoked judge, an injured Savior, a righteous tribunal, and think they hear that fatal doom and sentence pronounced on them by their own consciences, Go you cursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. 3. Those who are doubtful of their own condition, and are apt to fear the worst.

1. As for the first sort of these men, who have sincerely endeavored to please God, and have the testimony of their consciences, that in simplicity and godly sincerity they have had their conversation in this world, Christ has delivered them from all their fears by his death upon the cross, and his intercession for them at the right hand of God : the best men dare not stand the trial of strict and impartial justice ; they are conscious to themselves of so many sins, or such great imperfections and defects, that their only hope is in the mercy of God, through the merits and mediation of Christ ; and in this hope they can triumph over death, as St. Paul does ; O death ! where is thy sting ? O grave ! where is thy victory ! the sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law ; but thanks be to God, who hath given us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ, 1 Cor. xv. 55, 57. who destroyed sin, and plucked out the sting of death by his death upon the cross ; who triumphed over death by his resurrection from the dead, and is invested with power to raise all his true disciples from the dead : Is able to save to the utmost, all that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them, Heb. vii. 25.

This is the happy state of good men, when they come to die, they can look into the other world without terror, where they see, not a court of justice, but a throne of grace ; where they see a father, not a judge ; a Savior who died for them, and has redeemed them with his own blood : what a blessed calm and serenity possesses their souls ! Nay, what joy and triumph transports them. How do their souls magnify the Lord, and their spirits rejoice in God their Savior ! When they see him ready to pronounce them blessed, and to set the crown upon their heads ? Who would not die the death of the righteous, and desire that his latter end may be like his ! What wise man would not live the life of the righteous, that his latter end may be like his ; that in the agonies of death, and in the very jaws of the grave, no disturbed thoughts may discompose him ; no guilty fears distract him, but he may go out of the world with all the joyful presages of eternal rest and peace ?

2. As for wicked men, who never concerned themselves with the thoughts of God and another world, while they were in health, many times a dangerous sickness, which gives them a nearer view of death and judgment, awakens their consciences and overwhelms them with the unsupportable terrors of future vengeance ; then they begin to lament their ill-spent lives, to tremble before the just and righteous judge, whom they have provoked by repeated villanies ; whose being they formerly denied, or whose power and justice they defied ; now they cry passionately to Christ for mercy, and will needs have him to be their Savior, though they would not own him for their Lord, nor submit to his laws and government ; now these men are mighty earnest for comfort ; the minister, who was the subject of their drollery before, is sent for in great haste, and it is expected from him, that he should lull their consciences asleep, and send them quietly into another world, to receive their doom there.

Now it is very fitting to let these men know, while they are well, that there is no comfort to be had, when they come to die : For there is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked : and no man who knows them, can speak peace to them, without making a new gospel, or corrupting the old one.

What I have already discoursed concerning a death-bed repentance, is a plain proof of this : but though we set aside all that, and proceed upon the common principle, that a true penitent whenever he sincerely repents, though it be upon his death-bed, after a long life of wickedness, shall be pardoned and rewarded by God : yet upon these principles it is impossible, either for himself or others to judge, whether his repentance be true and sincere ; such a repentance as, if he were to live longer, would reform his life, and bring forth the fruits of an universal righteousness ; and it is agreed on all hands, that no other repentance but this can be accepted by God.

Now it is absolutely impossible, without a revelation, for any man to know this, who begins his repentance upon a death-bed : he may feel indeed the bitter pangs and agonies of sorrow, and may be sincerely and heartily sorry that he has sinned : and this every dying sinner is, who is sorrowful ; he is sincerely sorrowful ; that is, he does not counterfeit a sorrow, but really feels it : and I know nothing else to make sorrow sincere, but that it is real and not counterfeited ; and therefore to be sorrowful, and to be sincerely sorrowful, is the same thing ; and will any man say that whoever is sorry for his sins when he comes to die shall be saved ? Then no sinner can be damned, who does not die an atheist, or stupid and distracted, or suddenly, without any warning ; for it is impossible for a sinner, who is in his wits, and believes that wicked men shall be eternally punished in the next world, not to feel an amazing remorse and sorrow of mind, when he sees himself just a falling into hell.

A dying sorrow then, though it may be sharp and severe, almost to the degree of amazement and distraction (and it is hard, if such a sorrow be not real and sincere) is not saving repentance ; and therefore though sinners may feel themselves very heartily sorrowful, this does not prove them to be true penitents ; and yet this is the only evidence they can have of their repentance, and the only thing they can rely on, that they are sure their sorrow is very sincere ; and I doubt not but it is, for all true sorrow is sincere ; but sinners who are very sorry for their sins, may be damned.

Since then sorrow for sin is the only evidence such men can have of the sincerity of their repentance, let us consider whether the mere dying sorrows of sinners be any evidence at all of this, or what kind of evidence it is :

True repentance does at least include a change of mind, a turning from our sins to God, a deep sense of the evil of sin, and an abhorrence of ourselves for it, a great reverence for God, and for his laws, as well as a dread of his judgments ; and deliberate and serious resolutions of changing our course of life, and for the time to come, of living to God, and to the purposes of his glory, never to return to our old sins again, but diligently to exercise ourselves in all the duties and offices of a Christian life.

Now suppose a man, who has lived wickedly all his life, should be thus changed in a moment, and proved such a true penitent, as I have now described, and that God, who knows the hearts of men, sees that his promises and vows are sincere, and that if he were to live any longer, he would be a good man, and therefore will pardon and reward him, not according to what he has done, but according to what he foresees he would have done, had he lived any longer : (which is to judge men not according to their works, but according to his own fore-knowledge, which the scripture never makes the rule of future judgment) I say, suppose such men may be true penitents, and pardoned by God, who knows that they are so ; yet they can never have the comfort of it before they die, because it is impossible for them to know it.

When men see themselves a dying, they are very sorrowful for their sins, so they say, but the most likely account of it is, that they are very sorry they are going to hell, as a malefactor is very sorrowful, when he is going to the gibbet: this may be the whole of their sorrow, and it is impossible to prove that there should be any thing more in it, and extremely improbable that there is: for what likelihood is there, that men who yesterday were very much in love with their sins, and as little thought of falling out with them, as they did of their dying day, should to-day, as soon as ever they are arrested with a threatening sickness, be penitents in good earnest, and abhor their sins in a minute, and be quite other men upon the view of the other world? This is the case of all sinners, when they come to die, which makes it very suspicious, that there is nothing extraordinary in it, no miraculous power of the divine Spirit to change their hearts in a moment, and make them new men, but only the common effect of a great fear, which makes men sorry for their sins, when they come to suffer for them.

Now if such dying sinners can never be sure that their sorrow for sin is any thing more than a great fright, they can be sure of nothing else; for such a sorrow as this will counterfeit all the other acts of repentance; men who are terribly affraid of punishment, are not only sorry for their sins, but this very sorrow makes them ashamed of them, gives them a great indignation against themselves for them, makes them flatter their judge, and vow and promise reformation, if they could escape this one time ; and this is so very common and familiar, that in all other cases no man regards it ; a judge, a father, or a master, will not spare upon such promises as these ; and why should this be thought any thing more in a dying sinner, than in other malefactors ? Why should that be thought a sufficient reason for God to pardon, which we ourselves think no reason, in all other cases ? All this may be no more than the fear of hell ; and I doubt the mere fear of hell, when men are a dying, though it may imitate all the scenes of repentance, will not keep them out of hell. It is so very probable, that this is the whole of a death-bed repentance, that no such dying sinner can have any reasonable hope that he does truly repent ; and therefore unless he flatter himself, when he dies, with a false and counterfeit repentance, as he did, while he lived, with the hopes of repenting before he died, he must expire in all the terrors and agonies of guilty fears. This is so miserable a condition, that though we should suppose such a sinner may be a true penitent, and go to heaven at last, yet no wise man would endure these dying agonies for all the false and deceitful pleasures of sin : and yet there is no possible way of avoiding this, but by such a timely repentance, while we are well, and death at a distance, as may bring forth the actual fruits of holiness, that when we come to die, we may have some better evidence of the sincerity of our repentance, than mere dying sorrows.

3. Let us now consider the case of those who are doubtful what their condition is ; who are neither so good as to be out of all danger and fear, nor so bad as to be out of hope : and I need not tell any man that this is a state between hope and fear, which is a very uneasy state, when eternal happiness or misery is the matter of the doubt. This is the case of those men, who after all their good resolutions, are ever and anon conquered by temptations ; who as soon as their tears are dried up for their last fall, fall again, and then lament their sins, and resolve again ; and while they are thus interchangeably sinning, repenting, and resolving before they have got a lasting victory, or are arrived to a steady virtue, are summoned by death to judgment ; or those who have a reverence for God, but are not so constant and frequent in their devotion ; or if they abstain from gross and scandalous vices, yet they have not a due government of their passions, or do very little good in the world, &c. Here is such a mixture of good and evil, that it is hard to know which is predominant ; while such men are in health, they are very uneasy, and know not what to judge of themselves ; but they fall into much greater perplexities, when they are alarmed with the near approaches of death and judgment. And what a deplorable state is this, when we are dying, to be uncertain and anxious what will become of us to eternity ?

Now there is no possible way to prevent these fears when we come to die, but by giving all diligence to make our calling and election sure, by living such holy and innocent lives, that our consciences may not condemn us ; and then we shall have confidence towards God, 1. John iii. 20, 21.

But this is such a remedy, as few of these men like : they would be glad to be sure of heaven, but yet would go as near hell as they can, without danger of falling into it : they will serve God, but must reserve a little favor and indulgence to their lusts ; though they dare not take full draughts of sensual pleasures, yet must be sipping now and then, as often as they can pacify their consciences, and get rid of the fear of God, and of another world : and therefore they are very inquisitive after other cures for an accusing and condemning conscience : are mighty fond of such marks and signs of grace, as will secure them of heaven, without the severities of mortification, or the constant and uniform practice of an universal righteousness : and a great many such signs have been invented, which like strong opiates assuage their pain and smart, till their consciences awake, when it is too late, in the next world.

For all this is cheat and delusion, as St. John assures us, little children, let no man deceive you ; he that doth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous. He that committeth sin, is of the devil, for the devil sinneth from the beginning ; for this purpose the son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil. Whosoever is born of God, doth not commit sin ; for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God. In this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil ; whosoever doth not righteousness is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother, 1 John. iii. 7,—10. This is the only sure evidence for heaven ; and therefore every sin men commit, makes their state doubtful, and this must fill them with perplexities and fears : men may cheat themselves with vain hopes and imaginations when they come to die ; but nothing can be a solid foundation for peace and security, but an universal righteousness.

THE CONCLUSION.

FOR the conclusion of this discourse, I shall only observe in a few words, that it must be the business of our whole lives to prepare for death : our accounts must be always ready, because we know not how soon we may be called to give an account of our stewardship ; we must be always upon our watch, as not knowing what hour our lord will come. A good man, who has taken care all his life to please God, has little more to do when he sees death approaching, than to take leave of his friends, to bless his children, to support life, comfort himself with the hopes of immortal life, and a glorious resurrection, and to resign up his spirit into the hands of God and of his Savior ; his lamp is full of oil, and always burning, though it may need a little trimming when the bridegroom comes, Matth. xx. 1, &c. some few acts of faith and hope, and such devout passions as are proper to be exercised at our leaving the world, and going to God : but when the bridegroom is at the door, it is too late, with the foolish virgins, to buy oil for our lamps : unless we be ready when the bridegroom comes, to enter in with him to the marriage, the door will be shut against us ; watch therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the son of man cometh.

Some men talk of preparing for death, as if it were a thing that could be done in two or three days, and that the proper time of doing it were a little before they die ; but I know no other preparation for death but living well : and thus we must every day prepare for death, and then we shall be well prepared when death comes ; that is, we shall be able to give a good account of our lives, and of the improvement of our talents ; and he who can do this, is well prepared to die, and to go to judgment ; but he who has spent all his days wickedly, whatever care he may take when he comes to die, to prepare himself for it, it is certain he can never prepare a good account of his past life, and all his other preparations are little worth.

THE END.

SUBSCRIBERS' NAMES.

STATE OF NEW-YORK.

Albany.

| | | |
|-------------------|-------------------|------------------|
| W & J Anderson | James Balantine | Ebenezer Cowen |
| Patrick Atteridge | R O K Bennet | Sanford Cobb |
| Daniel Albertson | Margaret Baker | Robert Cameron |
| Jacob B Angus | Andrew Brown | Joel Curtis |
| Charles Boynton | John Bleecker | L Carter |
| Gerrit Bogart | Nich Bleecker jr | John Orton Cole |
| John Brown | J Best | Samuel H Clark |
| Simeon Brown | Peter Boyd | Elijah Craw |
| Hamilton Boyd | Robert Burle | Eleanor Deniston |
| Francis C Barnes | J M Bacon | Mary Diamond |
| Peter Van Buren | H Bleecker | David S Dodge |
| Elijah Brainard | John Brainard | Jos Denison |
| Melvin Bachelor | John A Bradt | John M'Donald |
| G V S Bleecker | Sybrant Bleecker | Jno W Dana |
| Christian Bork | Lucretia Brainard | Richard Dodge |
| W Beardsley | Paul Clark | Ephraim De Witt |
| John Briant | Reuben Chapman | Alexander Dow |
| Sarah Blakeman | William Consols | Richard Dawson |
| Maria Blackall | Levi Curtis | Robert Disney |
| Lucy Bleakly | Gilead Cande | Caleb Davison |
| Samuel Baxter | Alex Cameron | Peter Doag |
| William Brown | Thomas Carson | Ruth Donnelly |
| Jonathan Burt | John Cassidy | R Deuck |
| John Bowne | Ezra Caldwell | John Denney |
| Niram Bigelow | Silvenus Carlow | Hez Davidson |
| G W Barnes | Levi Call | Curtis De Forest |
| Wm Brinckly | Philp Cotton | E C Delevan |
| Samuel R Brown | Wm Carmichael | Margaret Denney |
| Solomon Brown | Mary Carlow | M Durant |
| Jesse Buel | Cox & Stephens | Benjamin Drurye |
| John Boardman | Daniel Campbell | Robert Dunbar |

| | | |
|------------------|------------------|-----------------|
| Henry Dyer | Nathan Hand | John G Klinck |
| William Earl | Abijah Hall | David R Kennedy |
| Samuel Edgar | Benjamin Hamer | Samuel Knower |
| Christopher Ely | Stephen Hodgkins | J D Kittridge |
| Samuel Emery | Wm I Hunt | Richard Kinny |
| Eben S Edgarson | L Halenbake | James Keeler |
| Anthon P Egberts | Ashur Huggins | E Kinnicut jr. |
| Solomon Enders | B C Humphrey | David Koy |
| James Ellison | Peter Hilton | Mary Lightbody |
| James Frazer | Cornelius Horton | Francis Low |
| Josiah Forbes | Erastus Hills | Benj. Lockwood |
| Timothy Fisk | Gideon Hawley | Samuel Lathrop |
| George Forbey | Arthur Hochkiss | Mary Lester |
| John Fisher | Gerard B Huyck | Alex Larabee |
| Timothy Fassett | George Hasper | L B Leonard |
| John C Feltman | Daniel Harris | J J Lansingh |
| William Fryer | Isaac Hutton | Isaac Lansingh |
| Martha Fondoy | Israel Husted | Caleb Lincoln |
| Peter Flynn | A Van Haskins | Thos Lockwood |
| Cor De Garmo | E Howard | M Lockwood |
| Adam Gordon | Nath Hawkins | Thomas Linacre |
| E Griffin | O Hosford | H Lansingh |
| H Greenhill | Isaac Herrington | S B Leonard |
| Wm H Grosser | Philip Helmer | James Lewis jr |
| David Goelder | John Hart | Joseph Ludlow |
| Helena Gourlay | James Hennery | Eliz Lockrow |
| Robert Gilmar | Nich Hoitman | G D Lockwood |
| William Giles | Erastus Halbeck | Abra Lansingh |
| Gregor M Gregor | Amos Holdtidge | Mary Merifield |
| Robert Gilston | John Hosford | Daniel Milton |
| John Gates | James Ingraham | Sarah Mynders |
| Wm Groesbeeck | M P Jackson | Lewis Martin |
| Benj Goodrich | David Jones | James Milligan |
| Joseph Green | John Jackson | Andrew M Millan |
| John Godley | Ichabod L Judson | James Moore jr |
| John Gray | Asa L Johnson | Caleb Matthews |
| Jona Goldwait | Daniel James | F G Myers |
| Noah Howard | W H Jephson | Ashur Merrill |

| | | |
|------------------|------------------|-------------------|
| S Merchant | William Pay | Barent Sanders |
| Lemuel Moss | Rufus Putnam | John Sergeant |
| Marcus Mallet | Jonathan Packard | Daniel Smith |
| John M'Pherson | J Porter | Elias Safferd |
| G A M'Liesk | Obadiah Platt | Walter Stewart |
| Alex M'Lavish | John Patridge | Roger Selden |
| Archibald M'Nab | James Prouty | John Smith |
| Eliz Morrow | E Pemberton | Levi Steele |
| Samuel Marwin | John Pruyan | H C Southwick |
| James Maxwell | J Quackenboss | Tunis Slingerland |
| C M'Conckey | John Rector | Caset Staats |
| Andrew M'Kenna | George Richards | Robert Shepherd |
| Wm M'Cullock | Philip Radcliff | H W Snyder |
| James Maher | Charles Rice | Hannah Stone |
| William M'Harg | James Rodgers | George Smith |
| James M'Cabe | John Robertson | Sally Sweasy |
| Richard Mochrie | Joseph Robbins | Francis Sim |
| John M'Murray | L H Rodgers | John Sipple |
| John M'Millan | Adam Russ | Adam Stewart |
| John M'Collum | Isreal Reynolds | Henry Smith |
| F M'Houghton | Simon Relyer | Obadiah Smith |
| Ebenezer Morse | K K V Rensselaer | J Schermerhorn |
| Curtis Munger | I Right | L Stevens |
| Wm M'Dougal | J T Rice | R Schermerhorn |
| James Mott | John Russell | Lawrence Sory |
| Joseph Morris | Elijah Rowley | Pearly Sharp |
| Wm Maxwell | Ammon Rice | David Stoughton |
| Jno M'Gorighy | Thos Radcliff | William Thomas |
| John M'Lochlan | Luzita Reckhow | John Talmage |
| James Mitchell | S C Ramond | Isaac Teller |
| William Neill | A C Sheldon | Henry Turner |
| John Van Ness | Lemuel Swift | A Thompson |
| Dorotha Nailer | Thos W Stanton | Daniel Thayer |
| James Nutt | D Seager, | H A Townsend |
| Christopher Oaly | Turner Smith | Charles Tanner |
| Thos E Osborn | Ezra Silver | Ferrit Tate |
| John I Ostrander | Samuel Shaw | C D Townsend |
| Owen Owens | S Smith | Elisha Tripp |

| | | |
|------------------|-------------------|------------------------|
| Henry R Truax | James Wilson | Benj R Bostwick |
| Philip Tolbert | E Willett | Andrew Bostwick |
| Win G Taylor | Samuel Wigton | Daniel Clark |
| Nath E Tallman | Samuel Wilson | Titus Goodman |
| Mary Turner | F Wormer | Hugh Gordon |
| S Topping | K J Winne | Daniel Hoag |
| George Upfold | Wm B Winne | J S Herrmance |
| N Vedder | James Wishart | Rufus Perkins |
| Alex Vedder | Horace Wilcox | John Plum |
| J Vandewaters | C S Winne | Warren Rich |
| Anna M Vischer | Wm Whitney | J I Van Rensselaer |
| I Vanderheyden | D Worthington | Adam Smith |
| W Vandenbergh | Colonic. | Amos Tufts |
| J V Valkenbergh | John F Bratt | Elizabeth Todd |
| C Vandervoort | Lewis Brownell | Elijah Washburn |
| J Van Vecten | George Colier | Bath. |
| Samuel Ward | Bernard Conner | Benjamin Vaughn |
| Sally Wright | Jonathan P Couch | Robert Vaughn |
| Ishmael L Wilson | Elias Davis | |
| Robert Wilson | Jacob Downing | Washington. |
| Francis Walley | S Van Duesavan | Jesse Abraham |
| W W Williams | Maria Hartness | Betsey Conger |
| F Wilkinson | Wm Leck | Elizabeth Goeway |
| Luke Wilder | John M'Kegg | Ann Lawson |
| James Wynkoop | C M Kelney | James Rattray |
| Thos Warn | John B Miller | Eliz Schuyler |
| Henry Van Wie | Wm Medon | |
| Daniel Wicks | John F Prudle | Gibbon's Ville. |
| Samuel Williams | Sarah Rubey | William Dyer |
| Charles West | Alex Sickels | James Hitchcock |
| Sylvester Wilson | Wm Stilwell | Julius Hanks |
| A W Watkins | Samuel Thomas | Troy. |
| John Watson | George Tibbits | David Butler D D |
| Genet Winten | Benj Winne | Wm Z Blanchard |
| Nathan Webb jun | Jacob L Winne | D Butler jr. |
| Mary Wallace | Greenbush. | Ely Burrit |
| Charles Warner | Lathrop M Allen | James Bishop |
| Elias Willard | | |

| | | |
|------------------|-----------------------|---------------------|
| Wm Belknap | Lansingburgh. | Wm Campbell |
| Rev Jonas Coe | Bethia Burrows | Oliver Crocker jr |
| Joseph Cook | Elijah Row | Nancy Clark |
| Gershom Cook | Sarah Bates | John Davison |
| Zachariah Curtis | Jane Bradshaw | Stephen Hoyt |
| John Castle | Myn V-Degroff | Horace Lathrop |
| George Dexter | Coleman Gates | James North |
| Hezekiah Eldrige | Catharine Harge | Isaac Rhines |
| Zina P Eggleston | Benjamin Low | Elisha Rickerson |
| Joshua Gilcrest | Mrs. M·Donald | Horace Ripley |
| N Gilbert | M S Miter | Jonathan Rudd |
| C P W Goodrich | Alonsing Payne | George W Russel |
| James Holland | Barbara Patterson | William Story |
| Wm G Haight | Clarisa Story | Simon Smith |
| Stephen Hoyt | Edward Tucker | Henry Smith |
| Anna Maria Hart | SG Vanderheyden | Julia Seely |
| George Kellog | Eliabzeth Weaver | James Thompson |
| Asa Kellog | | Warden Wilber |
| Philo D Lockwood | Waterford. | Joseph B Walton |
| Derick Lane | Roger C Evans | |
| John Lyon | Abraham Young | Springfield. |
| H V W Masters | | Wm Van Brunt |
| C Moody | Brunswick. | Selah Havens |
| William Neafas | E Wilmarth | |
| John Olmstead | | Cooperstown. |
| Ebenez Prescott | Bethlehem. | James Averill jr |
| Lavinia Stoddard | Arch M·Bryde | Eli F Benjamin |
| Stephen Selleck | Nathaniel Sawyer | Miles Benjamin |
| John Sheldon | | Omar Boden |
| Henry Tator | Guilderland. | Daniel Bow |
| Mary Thomas | John Baker | William Cook jr |
| Felix Tracy | Jesse White | John M Clark |
| Sarah Turner | | Moses Davis |
| JM Vanderheyden | Cherry Valley. | Jacob Duesler |
| A Waterbury | Brayton Allen | Elisha Foote |
| Arch'd Weldin | Oliver W Arnold | Thomas Fuller |
| Nathan Warren | James H Baily | Abraham Farling |
| Betsey Warner | John H Coon | Calvin Graves |

| | | |
|-----------------------|------------------|-----------------------|
| Joseph Holt | David Holt | A Merrel |
| Benj C Holt | Joseph Irving | Merrel & Camp |
| H W Lyon | Ade Peck | Isaac M'Chesney |
| Katharine Metcalf | John Suiter | Henry Morse |
| Sally Ostrander | | John Osborn |
| Daniel Olendorf | Utica. | Thomas Owens |
| Rinier Pruyn | N Buttler | James Pratt |
| G Reynolds | J A Bingham | George Plato |
| Rev John Smith | Henry Back | Gilbert Palmer |
| Isaac N Smith | Elijah Brown | John Queal |
| F Stranahan | Calvin Bicknell | J V Rensselaer |
| Wm Sprague | Obadiah Ballou | Ralph H Rogers |
| Wm Stewart | Levi Barnum | Silas G Strong |
| Benjamin Wight | Alexander Cook | William Sickels |
| Hinckley Walker | John Camp | Truman Smith |
| | Lewis Clark | William Staples |
| Otsego. | Joseph Clark | John Snow |
| Lois H Doubleday | Z B Clark | William Smith |
| Ezekial Kellog | Erastus Cross | Daniel Smith |
| David Marvin | George V Cise | Henry Tisdale |
| Isaac Stocker | Thomas Christian | Wm A Tennery |
| James Sholes | Thos Cornwall | Abm Taylor |
| Jedediah Smith | N Christian | Hannah Thomas |
| Daniel Tully | H Dwight D D | N N Weaver |
| E Vanbenschoten | J H Dodd | Solomon Wolcott |
| Joseph Wood | Wm Donaldson | Wm Whitely |
| Julius Warren | Titus Evans | John Whitney |
| | Samuel Flint | John Welles |
| Exeter. | S F French | |
| Rev Daniel Nash | James Garret | Whitesborough. |
| | Charles Gear | B M Brainard |
| German Flatts. | H J Hulbert | Salome Calkin |
| Stutely Palmer | Jesse Hooker | William Ells |
| Juet Woodworth | David P Hoyt | Susanna Ells |
| | Elkanah Hobby | Clarisa Ells |
| Herkimer. | John Housten | Hannah Fowler |
| John Crane | J Hedges | Elihu Grant |
| Wm Holdrige | Elisha Lovett | Thos R Gold |

| | | |
|---------------|-----------------|---------------------|
| Jonathan Hall | Ephraim Howe | Augusta. |
| Newton Mann | W B Lacey D D | Hervey Durkee |
| Maheo D Mott | Mrs Lacey | Brownville. |
| Helen Platt | Davis Lake | Phineas Smith |
| Joshua Perry | S T McConger | |
| Abby Rhodes | Elnor Nelson | Schenectady. |
| Benj B Smith | Maria Seymor | Kennedy Farrell |
| Wiider Storey | | |
| John Wright | Clinton. | Stillwater. |

New-Hartford.

N Caulking
John Chadwick
Richard Fungor
F Huntington
Eleazor Hovey
John H Handy
R P Hayes
John I Osborn
Noah Porter
Samuel Payne
Cornelius Reed
W Randal
Nancy Spepherd
Josiah Trefft
Timothy Willis
H Woodruff
Thos Williams

S Carpenter
Charles Hastings
S P Herrick
S Lamberton

Hamilton College.

Rufus Cossit
James Dean
Theo S Gold
Charles S Henry
Lucius C Higgins
H F Lockwood
Eleazer Lathrop
Heer Leonard
Elisha S Lee
Josiah Noyes
Seth Norton
Zephaniah Platt
Daniel Le Roy
Stephen Taylor 3d

Peter Allen
M Andrews
Peter Andrews
Thos Benjamin
Wm Brown
Garret Bell
W Broughton
Abijah Blanchard
G Concklin
Jacob Cole
Nicholas Depew
J Edmonds
Nathan Evans
Henry Ensign
Elias Geneson
E Gilbert
Amos Hodgman
Moses Hunter
Smith Lawrence
Samuel Low
Isaac Lamb

Paris.

S H Addington
L Baldwin
John Deland
Dana Dunbar Uri Doolittle
Martin Hawley
John Hubbard

S W Tracy
S A Van Vechten
P Van Vechten

George Miller
Hiram Mosier
Newel Miller
Thomas Morey

Manlius.

Daniel Jones
C Remington jr
Easton Sherman

James Olmsted
Elias Ostrander
Elisha Parks
J W Patrick

| | | |
|----------------------|----------------|---------------------|
| E Patrick | Nassau | John W Tobias |
| Wm Parsons | Isaac Ackley | Barent Van Vleck |
| Wm Patrick jr | E D Basset | E D Wolcott |
| Wm Powell | Hosea Bebee 2d | J Waterbury |
| H Reynolds | Philo Curtis | |
| Stephen Richards | Abel Gardner | New-Lebanon. |
| N D Sherwood | Harvy Goodrich | Nathan Avery |
| Benj Stratton | John Griswold | Isaac Ackley |
| W Seymour | George Hoag | H W Betts |
| Bradley Sellick | Henry Hermans | John Bull jun |
| James Swart | Wm King | E F Booge |
| R Schuyler | D Landon jun | Ambrose Church |
| Wm Updike | Normun Landon | Wm Clark |
| Lewis Waterbery | Sam Morton | Jeremiah King |
| | A Pickering | Elihu Lyman |
| New-Scotland. | Chauncy Porter | Ezra F Pabody |
| Joanna Clink | Paul Roberts | Ezra D Sackett |
| Joseph Van Cott | John Ried | D B Strannahan |
| John Van Levant | T Snider | Elam Tilden |
| N Osborn | Philo Sackett | |
| Daniel Simpson | Meshack Strait | |

The following Names were accidentally Omitted :

| | | |
|-----------------|--------------------|---------------|
| Albany. | Jane Milton | Utica. |
| L Cooper | | James Scott |
| Benjamin Curtis | Stillwater. | |
| Amos Fassett | S O Donnell | |

H.M.

