ANY one who studies carefully the phenomena of modern, and especially of more recent times, and endeavours to discover the hidden spring which directs the sequence of events, will always find his researches lead him back to one and the same central motive power, producing the state of mind through which the evil spirit of the age contrives to distort truth, history, and justice. The radical perversion of men's minds going on around us is indeed terribly systematic. Comparing the onward progress of the social, political, and religious world to that of a river, we shall find that the poison which taints the water comes in each case from the same source. There are, it is true, some tributary rivulets which add their quota of infection to the main stream, but these are of secondary importance.

Human errors and passions, organised as they are by the secret Society of Freemasonry, constitute the chief power of this evil.

The Christian world has for many years past lulled itself to sleep in the pleasing thought that this sinister conspiracy is, after all, not so very formidable, and is gradually becoming a mere matter of ridicule. A great mistake has been made on this subject. Even before the outbreak of the first French Revolution, Freemasonry had not so vast a power, so much internal unity, so firm a footing in influential circles, so world-wide a command of the press, as it has in our own day. It is high time to awake from sleep, and carefully to reconnoitre the forces of the enemy.

This we have attempted to do, and have drawn our information from most trustworthy sources, principally from the records of the Lodges. Furthermore, every assertion is supported by proof. Amongst these proofs, some may be found hitherto unknown, or at least unpublished in Germany; for it was during our sojourn in a foreign land that, thanks to an exceptionally fortunate chain of circumstances, we were enabled finally to unravel the mystery of this dark Association.

As we are attacking things, and not individuals, we have carefully avoided any mention of the names of persons yet living; and this reticence, dictated by Christian principle, has often obliged us merely to hint at what we would fain have expressed more definitely.

We here wish distinctly to assert, as we shall have occasion repeatedly to do in the course of this work, that we do not impute to all Freemasons the ultimate aims of their Secret Society. Few only are completely initiated ; the greater number of the Brethren sin in ignorance. It is to be hoped, therefore, that these too may read this little book, and be enlightened as to their real position.

We will conclude, in the words of Barruel (“Mémoires pour servir à l’Histoire du Jacobinisme,” vol. i. p. 20. Hamburg, 1803.) :—“To whatever creed, to whatever government, to whatever class of society you belong, as soon as Jacobinism gains the ascendant, and the plans and sworn designs of the Secret Society come into operation, there is an end to your religion, your clergy, your government, and your laws, your property and your authority. All your possessions, your lands and houses, your very families and fire-sides, all these from that day forth you can no longer call your own.”

INTRODUCTION.

THE recent resignation by the Marquis of Ripon of the Grand Mastership, and the consequent acceptance of that office by the Prince of Wales, have drawn public attention in this country to the proceedings of Freemasonry, and have awakened a not unreasonable curiosity touching its constitution and aims. Not that the subject stands in need of such adventitious and transitory motives in order to win for itself a claim on our notice, for, considered merely as a fact of contemporaneous history, it merits the most serious and most careful inquiry. That a society should exist in the midst of us, which has already extended its ramifications in all quarters of the world, and embraces at this time, as we have been told, above seventeen millions of members,—that it should be compacted in visible unity by virtue of a secret oath, binding under the most terrible sanctions on each and all of its members,—that it should claim exclusive possession of an esoteric doctrine, unknown to the profane, by which the world is eventually to be freed from all its moral, social, and political diseases, and the universal brotherhood of man is to be regenerated into light,—that it should, while professing to tolerate all forms of religion, yet preserve a sort of theology and a grotesque ritualism exclusively its own,—that it should exact from all its adherents a blind obedience to orders mysteriously issued and secretly conveyed,—is a phenomenon so startling, so pregnant with probable results in the future, as to demand the closest examination.

No apology, therefore, is necessary for presenting to the public in an English dress an account of Freemasonry which has been recently published in Germany. The reader will not fail to notice, while perusing its pages, that the information contained therein is principally obtained from official documents of the body, and from the speeches of its more prominent officials in different parts of Europe. This, of course, greatly enhances its value, and gives increased weight to the conclusions at which the author has arrived. Indeed, it can scarcely now be doubted that the covert aims of this remarkable body are directed to the ultimate subversion of all altars and thrones, and to a complete revolution in the moral and social life, as at present established. It is true that the main efforts of Freemasonry are directed to the extirpation of the Catholic Church, if possible; and, failing this, to the greatest practical diminution of her influence over the souls of men, by restricting her liberty of action, undermining her supremacy over the consciences of her children, and most especially by depriving her of her divinely appointed office as schoolmistress of youth. But one very sufficient reason for this policy is to be discovered in the fact that the Catholic Church is the mainstay of constituted authority, and that to her authority it is, even in non-Catholic states, principally owing that the moral laws and social as well as political life which were originally the products of the Christian faith, still retain their hold on the public conscience, and continue to mould and animate modern society. Freemasonry, therefore, is clear-headed enough to perceive that the Catholic Church is the greatest existing hindrance to the success of its projects, and that, if once it could remove her out of the way, its eventual triumph would only be a question of time. But it does not essay a wrestling-match with that Church alone; Christianity itself, as a system of revealed truths, must be uprooted, in order that the new gospel may be planted in its place, and the supposed dupes of an effete superstition may be transformed into veritable Gnostics—into children of the new light.

It is not for one moment to be supposed that all the seventeen million members of this secret association are aware of the ultimate issues contemplated by the more thoroughly initiated. There is a vast majority, doubtless, which lives and dies in those inferior grades in which nothing is presented to the mind that might cause too rude a shock to religious prejudice, and to a loyalty as yet unweaned. Many, it may be well imagined, are kept in this state of Gnostic infancy, because they are by nature deprived of that eagle eye which can bear unflinching the full light of the new revelation. For such there is provided a disciplina arcani, by which they are hoodwinked to the end; and Freemasonry, to these apprentices in the Craft, is little else than a friendly confederation occupied in offices of mutual help and charity. Very much the same may be said of those exalted personages who are induced to assume the apron. There are honorary degrees astutely provided for them, and their knowledge of the esoteric teaching is in inverse proportion to their dignity of order. They are, nevertheless, eminently useful, for they serve at once as pledges of respectability, and as decoys for the association to which they are thus affiliated. They at once attract others to follow in their footsteps by their powerful example, and they themselves, as well as others outside, are lulled into a false security by the simple fact of their initiation. It is to be feared that there are some among this class who are more or less aware of the dangers by which they are environed, and join the Society either with the cowardly and fallacious hope of being able to direct what they dare not confront, or perhaps, in some cases, with the baser motive of eventually securing themselves at the expense of their country and of the stability of modern society.

Comparatively small, however, is the number of those before whose eyes the veil of symbol and fantastic rite is raised, and the real object to which they have dedicated themselves blindfold is openly revealed. Even these must submit to a long course of patient preparation, during which the first principles of religion and loyalty are gradually and dexterously eradicated, ere they are deemed worthy of admission to that grade of Manichean sanctity (Kadosh), which supposes the votary to be prepared for unshrinking obedience to the commandments of this new gospel of darkness.

But here we are met with a difficulty which must be fairly confronted, at least if the present translation from the German is to answer the purpose for which it is now presented to the English public. It is generally supposed amongst us that English Freemasonry is totally distinct and different from that which has already done so much mischief on the Continent, and is preparing yet more gigantic evils for a future time. Let it be as evil abroad as its most uncompromising enemies have described it, here in England, at least, men may say, it is quite innocuous, and, however fantastic may be its outer forms, and however unnecessarily secret may be its bond of union, it is really little else than a charitable institution. There is, doubtless, an element of truth in this general belief. The English character could not easily be shaped to ends such as are contemplated in the occult philosophy of the higher grades. It is loyal and naturally religious, and would not brook an unveiled conspiracy against the altar and the throne.

Moreover it is eminently practical, and could not easily be brought to sanction a proclamation of war against property and the recognised principles of social and political life. Would it then be matter of surprise if it should turn out that the number of those who have been admitted in our country into that thirtieth degree of full enlightenment is very small indeed? It may be that by far the majority of English Freemasons do not get beyond the degree of mere apprenticeship, and are utterly unsuspecting of the revolutionary and atheistic schemes that are being insidiously pushed on to their final issues by more knowing associates, while they give the prestige of respectability and their collective weight to a body that trades upon their ignorance and simplicity. Nevertheless, after all that may be pleaded in favour of the exceptional character commonly attributed to English Freemasonry, there is, it must be owned, another side of the question which is deserving of the gravest consideration.

So far as Catholics are concerned, the question has been already settled. No Catholic can enroll himself in a secret society without incurring excommunication; and no Freemason can be received into the fold of Christ, unless he has previously made up his mind to withdraw altogether from such an association. The course of ecclesiastical legislation is sufficiently plain, and every true child of the Church would be prepared to yield unconditional submission to its provisions. But there are many, nevertheless, who, while ready to accept on faith the judgment of the Church, are puzzled to discover a sufficient reason for such prohibition. It may be that they are personally acquainted with members of the Craft whose loyalty is undoubted, whose moral and social character are exemplary. The persons in question appear, moreover, to be faithful and conscientious members of the religious communion to which they have attached themselves, and with evident sincerity maintain that there is nothing in Freemasonry, so far as they know, which interferes with a man's duty to his God, his king, his country, his family, himself. Nay, there have been cases in which, after conversion to the Church, such persons have conscientiously asserted that there was nothing in the principles of Freemasonry, as made known to them, which in their judgment militated against the system of faith and morals imposed upon them by virtue of their new allegiance. What is there to be said in answer to such facts? Is it possible to assign any reason, appreciable by the common run of men and by those who are not versed in theology, why the Church has with unwavering severity condemned such associations?

That men of lealty, honour, and virtue have enrolled, and do enrol themselves still, among the members of this Craft, cannot be denied; that they would not do violence to their conscience by remaining in a body which they knew to proclaim a revolt against religion, constituted authority, and the moral law, we have no sufficient reason to doubt ; that consequently they are excusable in the sight of God, if they are non-Catholics, may be confidently believed ; that they may even use their fellowship with evil, hidden from their sight, for the more practical exercise of a noble philanthropy, few, if any, would be loth to acknowledge ; yet it is undeniable, notwithstanding, that they are, however unconsciously, violating one of the most vital principles of the natural law by giving their name to a secret confederation. For no man has a right to yield up his moral liberty into the hands of an unknown and self-constituted authority. It is not permitted to any one that he should take an oath in the dark, or unreservedly submit himself to an authority whose claims he is unable antecedently to gauge. Each one of us is individually responsible for his own actions ; nor can such responsibility be transferred without sin, save to an authority constituted by God, and then only so far as is permitted by an express divine sanction. To promise silence with regard to teaching and a course of action about which we know absolutely nothing at the time we make the promise, is intrinsically evil. When, moreover, this secrecy is enforced by the sanction of an oath—the most solemn and indissoluble bond by which the freedom of the will can be fettered—the heinousness of the crime is proportionally increased. An example—hypothetical, if you please—will serve to illustrate what one would have supposed, save for the facts alluded to above, sufficiently plain in itself. Suppose the case of a man who, on entering a secret society, pledges himself by a fearful oath not to reveal to any one the teaching or commands which may afterwards be communicated to him. After a time he gets to know that he is associated in a widely-spread conspiracy against kings, governments, property, and all forms of religion as at present constituted. He receives, later on, an order to dog the footsteps of a given individual, till he can find a safe occasion to assassinate his victim. What is he to do, if the principle of right within him has not already been undermined? He can take no counsel outside the conclave of conspirators, because he has bound himself to secrecy. His liberty of action is fettered, because he has submitted to become the slave of an unknown oligarchy. His conscience revolts against the crime, but how can he escape from its commission? He must either withdraw from the Society, with serious inconvenience to himself; or violate his oath and abide the certain consequences; or refuse obedience, and incur thereby the terrible punishment which irresponsible authority has decreed for such delinquency. He stands in peril of his life if he refuses; poignant remorse and a gradual extinction of the moral sense infallibly await him if he should consent. No man has a right to reduce himself of his own free will to the bare possibility of such a terrible alternative. The act is intrinsically immoral, nor can any possible combination of motives or circumstances lessen, much less destroy, its moral turpitude. It is true that implicit obedience, the surrender of free will, is, according to Catholic teaching, one of the evangelical counsels, but not to an unknown and self-constituted authority. The superiors whom the religious professes to obey are appointed according to fixed laws which have received the solemn approbation of the Church. Neither are there any secrets whose disclosure is reserved for after years. There are no monita secreta in any Orders or Congregations of regulars which have received the Church's sanction; these are reserved for secret societies. On the contrary, the postulant for admission is submitted to a long probation, during which it is a duty enforced upon him to study all the rules and constitutions of the body, and to make himself practically acquainted with its life and aims. Nothing is kept back. Then, and not till then, is he permitted, should he still wish it, to take his vows. But even after his formal admission his obedience is not wholly unconditional. It is always understood by all, and often expressly stated in the rules, that he is in no case bound to obey an order which he judges to involve the commission of sin. Thus ample reservation is made for the supremacy of conscience, seeing that the submission of the will extends only to actions in themselves either indifferent or good, and introduces those who yield it, so far as human weakness and infirmity in this its transitory state of trial may permit, to that highest degree of liberty, as St Austin defines it—immunity from sin. But to bind the will unconditionally to an unknown oligarchy, unsanctioned by civil or ecclesiastical authority,—to seal one's tongue forever by a fearful oath with regard to an esoteric philosophy to be gradually revealed hereafter, is equally a violation of the natural law and of the divine commands; while it inevitably tends to weaken, and eventually destroy, the security of social, civil, and ecclesiastical institutions. It establishes a hidden empire within the empire, a hidden family within the family, a hidden sect within all religious communions. Such an association may strive to caricature the Church's catholicity, but it dares not be, like her, as a "city seated on a mountain which cannot be hid" (St Matt. v. 14).

There is another point about which Catholics must not allow themselves to be deceived. Freemasonry, wherever it may have taken up its habitation, and however it may be modified by the exigencies of the moment or the pressure of public opinion, is the avowed enemy of the Catholic Church. It is quite possible that here in England this secret confederation may have accommodated itself somewhat, for the present, to what it would call the prejudices of the people. But on this one question it is outspoken and unreserved, confident in the sympathies of a vast majority. At a meeting of the Provincial Grand Lodge of Warwickshire, held under the presidency of Lord Leigh, Brother J. C. Parkinson, Grand Deacon of the Lodge, and Grand Master of the Provincial Grand Lodge of Middlesex, in responding to the toast of the "Rulers of the Craft," said that while he regretted the retirement of the Marquis of Ripon, he could not share the naïve astonishment of some at being told that a Roman Catholic might not continue to fill a leading position in the Craft. The fact was, that the two systems of Romanism and Masonry were not only incompatible, but were radically opposed.<sup>1</sup> Again, at a meeting of the "Great City" Lodge, held at the Cannon Street Terminus Hotel, the present Lord Mayor of London, in response to the toast "Success to the Great City Lodge," proposed by the same ubiquitous Brother Parkinson, let drop, during the course of his speech, the following remarks: "The present time was a most eventful one, and not the less for the great contest raging between darkness and light. Popery and the Pope himself were determined to put down freedom and good-will; but this country and the Prince of Wales had determined that light (Gnostic?) should prevail, and that everything that was good, and graceful, and beneficial should be put forward, and stand before all mankind." Another Freemason orator, Brother Hutton, on the same occasion, surpassing the Lord Mayor himself in the bold fervour of his rhetoric, declared "it was well known that the liberties of the world were threatened when the Ultramontanes were taking counsel together, and the broad issue was between the darkness of priest-craft and the intelligence and progress of our nation,"<sup>1</sup> as duly cared for and nourished, doubtless, by Masonic craft.

It is impossible that Catholics should, after these open declarations, complain of any reticence on the part of the officials connected with English Freemasonry. These latter tell the faithful, as plain as men can speak, that Freemasonry is incompatible with Catholic belief and practice,—that a contest had now begun in right earnest between the “darkness” of the Church and the “light” of their regenerating Craft,—and that the Prince of Wales, as Grand Master, is determined, in union with his brother Masons, to ensure the triumph of the light. Can it be credited, after this, that there are Catholics to be found simple enough to believe,—not that there are innocuous and estimable men among the Craft, which no one would be inclined to deny,—but that English Freemasonry is quite distinct from, and independent of, Continental Freemasonry in constitution and object? Can they for one moment believe that a society, whose only aim is the practical exercise of charity and mutual philanthropy, would require an oath of secrecy, adopt a peculiar ritual, establish methods of mutual recognition concealed from the profane, all for the mere purpose of organising a system of outdoor relief? Is there, or is there not, a solidarity between the home and foreign Lodges? Can it be denied that the most advanced and revolutionary Lodge in the whole Craft originally sprung from British soil? English Freemasonry, indeed, has been contented in days gone by to pass for a mere benevolent society, for it could find no adversary worthy of its energies. But now that the Church is daily gaining strength and influence in our land, it has thrown the mask aside, and partially, at least, reveals its purposes. Catholics have themselves alone to blame if they continue to be duped by the declarations of mere novices, or by the show of moderation enforced till now upon the Craft by the tone of public thought.

But the present translation is not intended for Catholics only. All those who sincerely profess the Christian religion, and accept it as a divine revelation, are equally bound to inform themselves about the constitution and aims of an association which threatens the existence of positive religion under every form; while all those who love their country, reverence established authority, and realise the paramount influence of family ties in promoting the education, stability, and true happiness of a people, are in like manner bound to examine whether the accusations which have been made against Freemasonry are true, viz., that its endeavours are directed to the revolutionising of the first, the subversion of the second, and the entire extinction of the third.

It is quite plain, moreover, that every one who believes in the authority of conscience and in the existence of a natural law, however he may disregard the prohibitions of the Papal See, is nevertheless morally bound to determine within himself whether it is right and lawful for him to become a member of this Association before taking the irrevocable step. Is it ever permissible to join a body which exacts on admission an oath of secrecy as regards its proceedings, plans, aims, teaching? If these are innocent, the oath is useless, and therefore wrong; if they are not innocent, the oath is an immoral restraint of liberty, and therefore a graver offence against the first principles of right. Furthermore, there is presumptive evidence in favour of the second hypothesis; for it is a characteristic of evil that it ever shuns the light: cæcum omne scelus. Practices of mere philanthropy and Christian charity can only be impeded by the introduction of a secret oath, and can, therefore, never supply a plausible reason for its imposition. Under such circumstances, no one can advisedly join a secret society without violating the plain dictates of his conscience; for to take an oath without a plain necessity is intrinsically evil.

But the evidence contained in the little work which is now set before the reader is of such a kind as to exclude all reasonable doubt concerning the aims of Freemasonry. It is plainly enough an organised conspiracy against all authority, civil or ecclesiastical, and against the first principles of Christian society as at present constituted, even though the majority of its members may be kept in convenient ignorance of the facts. The political and religious millennium, which it is striving with fullest energy to introduce, has been partially realised already in the French Revolution of 1792, and in the temporary Communism which spread terror through the length and breadth of "Fair France" in more recent times. Its influence in this country is now being exercised in proportion to the strength and persistency of the Catholic revival, which is making itself more and more felt among us every day we live. Freemasonry in England is no longer quiescent, for the times and the condition of things are changed. It now stands forth partially unmasked, and proclaims an internecine war with the Church of God, whenever an opportunity presents itself. Yes; for the moment, it is true, the Catholic Church is the one object of its machinations. But why? Because, first of all, it knows too well that its avowed efforts chime in with the tone of public opinion in this country; and then, in the second place, because it is fully persuaded that if it can but succeed against this its most formidable enemy, it will be able to make short work of all other communions professing themselves Christian. It is too astute not to perceive that the fate of Christianity is indissolubly bound up with the fortunes of the Papal See; and with consummate craft it makes use of the divisions of Christendom to uproot, if that were possible, the faith and very name of Christ. The principles which it is disseminating everywhere under the rose with such signal success, are antagonistic to all supernatural religion under whatever form ; nay, even to the primary dictates of natural religion.

As many may feel inclined to be sceptical about the truth of these assertions, and of the dismal revelations made in the following pages, and as a yet greater number may still encourage in themselves the fond delusion that English Freemasonry is not chargeable with the revolutionary and atheistic intentions which, as they are willing to allow, animate the Continental Lodges, it will not be out of place to set the whole matter more clearly before the reader. Of course it cannot be expected that direct and formal proof of these assertions can be produced in the case of a confederation which conceals its inner teaching and designs from the public eye by a solemn oath of secrecy, imposed on all its members under the most fearful sanctions ; but it may be possible to arrive at a judgment, practically certain, in another way.

Suppose, for one moment, that the alleged charges against Freemasonry in general, and in consequence against English Freemasonry, as forming an integral part of, and remaining in communion with, the other sections of the Craft, are really true. For the sake of the argument let it be assumed that this secret brotherhood is bent upon subverting the altar, the throne, the family ; that it aims at destroying all authority, and at building up upon the ruins of Christian civilisation a universal communism from which all belief in God and in the fundamental principles of morality is to be rigorously excluded. The question, we will suppose, is mooted among the leading spirits of the sect as to how England can be best prepared for this atheistic millennium—as to the safest means to be adopted for inducing her eventually to aid in its establishment. They know (as every one knows) that there is a deep religious sentiment embedded in the natural character of the people, that there is also a conspicuous respect for law and constituted authority; and, finally, that the spirit of the family, nowhere more cherished, has been of long time the salt which has preserved it from corruption and dissolution. It is a nation more pertinacious in its prejudices than consistent in its logic—more influenced by its feelings than its intellect. Proud of its traditions, suspicious of changes, distrustful of theories, eminently sensitive in its honour, wedded to home and ties of family, the secret directors of “the Craft” would see the un-wisdom of revealing to it for the present the veiled features of the false prophet. But there is a weak point where the enemy perceives a possibility of entrance—England is distracted by the conflicting claims of a thousand sects. Its Establishment is losing day by day its claim to be the chosen religion of the great majority; and because of that conservatism which is a necessity of its being, does not make full public proof of that power which it still retains. The communions which have separated from it are jealous of its influence and clamorous against its privileges. Yet all are united in claiming the unrestricted right of private judgment, in denouncing what they term

Popery, and in opposing themselves to its reviving influence.

With such facts to deal with, how would Freemasonry prepare its plans of eventual triumph, if its aims be such as have been supposed? It may, of course, attack the Catholic Church as openly and as vigorously as it pleases, for, in so doing, it is in perfect harmony with the spirit of the times. It may do its best also against Ritualism with equal safety, for the mind of the nation identifies this latter with the former. But further than this it dares not go at present. Open assaults on government, religion, social distinctions, rank, military establishments, may do very well in other countries, but they will not do here. The people are not as yet prepared for them, and, were their eyes to be prematurely opened, might become troublesome, if not dangerous. All hope, therefore, must be in the future; and for the future generation provision must be made. Luckily the opportunity presents itself spontaneously. The whole country, within this present generation, has been agitated on the subject of primary education, and it was no sooner made apparent that the public mind was turned in that direction, than the matter, of course, assumed a prominent place in political programmes, and became at once what is called a party question. The main hindrance in the way of a final adjustment was what has been called the religious difficulty. By an arrangement, however, which did credit to the eminent statesman who contrived it, the difficulty was fairly met and overcome. It is true that the legislative measure in which that arrangement was included confined religious and moral instruction within comparatively narrow limits, practically encouraged the neglect of it, and reduced it to the level of a sort of after-dinner entertainment. Yet it left the parents of the child free to send it to a school whose training was in accord with the dictates of their conscience; while it provided secular schools for the benefit of those who might consider that religious belief had no legitimate place in the education of their children. Freemasonry, if its designs are such as we have supposed, would have gained much already from those concessions, for religion has been thereby excluded from the schools supported by the State, as a recognised and essential part of their educational course. But this is as nothing compared with what it would require for the eventual accomplishment of its designs. It is perspicacious enough to perceive that, while Catholic schools would continue to receive State support, the provisions of the Bill would offer little impediment to a Church whose whole education is founded on a definite creed, and on the basis of an objective and supernatural morality. It is not blind to the fact, moreover, that the English Establishment persistently endeavours, in spite of its internal disunion, to nourish religious ideas and obedience to the natural law among its scholars. Under these adverse circumstances, what is its best policy of action? Agitate for a repeal of the twenty-fifth clause—promote with unremitting energy the extension of purely secular schools in all our principal centres—prepare public opinion by degrees for a system of compulsory education—then, when all is ready, induce the State to recognise secular schools alone as answering to its imperial demands, and the triumph will be complete. The children of the entire population will be driven by force of law into schools where they will be, by stern necessity, brought up in utter ignorance of God, of Christian obedience, of Christian morality.

It is, indeed, a strange and most displeasing fact that Freemasonry should have been aided in these its projects (if such they be, and there can scarcely be a doubt that such they are), by the even boisterous co-operation of political Dissenters. Strange, of a truth, that the spiritual heirs of ancestors who were worthily distinguished for their personal love of the Divine Redeemer should clamour for the exclusion of the very name of Christ and of God, of heaven and hell, from schoolrooms subsidised by the State, rather than consent that a single child, by means of aid from Government, should learn of Christ and duty from the lips of a Catholic or Anglican schoolmaster. It is idle to assert, considering what the tendencies of human nature are, that the influences of the Sunday-school, even were its sphere of action enlarged a thousand-fold, could supply the need of moral and religious instruction. It is yet more idle to pretend that parents who are striving from early morn till night to provide the bare necessities of life for themselves and families, and return home only for food and sleep, could take in hand this all-important duty, or hope to succeed if they attempted it. If these Nonconformist communions, owing to past remissness in providing for the education of the poor children belonging to their several persuasions, find to their cost that the English Establishment and the Catholic Church come in for the lion's share in the distribution of State grants, would it not be nobler and more honourable to acknowledge their former deficiency, and enter upon a plan of generous rivalry with the religious bodies above mentioned, by employing the vast funds at their disposal in the not least solid, because least ostentatious, effort to spread the knowledge of religious and moral truth among their own people in accordance with their several peculiar tenets, rather than to follow the example of Samson, and submit to their own annihilation with cheerfulness, provided that Catholic and Ritualist are involved in the universal ruin? Let them be assured that the powerful and widely-extended means which Freemasonry has gained, and ceaselessly uses, for influencing public opinion, have not been as yet directed against themselves, because "the Craft" knows full well that they will become its easy prey when they stand alone in the arena; "it keeps them, like an ape, in the corner of its jaw; first mouthed, to be last swallowed; when it needs what you have gleaned, it is but squeezing you, and, sponge, you shall be dry again." Are you, the Nonconformists of England, prepared to pave a way for its victory over religion, civil and social order, and the first principles of morality? Are you really conscious of what you are preparing for your country and for your own co-religionists, while supporting with the weight you at present possess a system of what is called secular education, from which all mention of God and of future reward and punishment, and the sweet influences of your Redeemer's love, are rigorously banished? Do you wish to see England given over captive to an unfeeling infidelity, and all reverence for authority, all filial obedience, all distinctions of social grade, the pure influences of home, the recognition of a moral law, universally cast into the limbo of obsolete prejudices and so-called mediæval superstitions? Yet, in the actual state of things, no more effectual aid could be given to such detestable designs than that which you offer by the policy you are pursuing in the vital question of national education.

No Catholic would feel disposed to accuse even those Nonconformists who have adopted this unhappy policy of a complicity with such detestable designs; and it would be yet more unjustifiable to lay it to the charge of the whole body of Dissenters, seeing that they are by no means unanimous upon the point in question. Moreover, their general professions of peculiar devotion to the world's Divine Redeemer, the life of unworldliness and piety which they advocate and strive to maintain according to the light that is in them, their system of home training, which, till recently at all events, rather discouraged secular learning than otherwise, on the ground that it was prejudicial to the principles of vital religion, would secure them from so hasty a judgment. It was for this reason that, at the outset of the present digression, distinct mention was made of political Dissenters. Nevertheless, repeated facts have unhappily conspired to prove that the policy referred to is more generally adopted by the members of these bodies than their religious professions would have led us to anticipate. Can it be that here too in England, as in Germany and Switzerland, the Protestant sects are yielding up one by one the Christian tenets which they at first retained to the imperious demands of popular indifferentism and hatred of dogmatic truth?

But, to return to the main subject in hand,—let us resume the hypothesis already made. If it be true, Freemasonry in this country, as elsewhere, is bent upon the subversion, not of the altar only, but of the throne, of distinctions of rank, and generally of all civil authority. It knows that it has undertaken a difficult task; for the English are naturally a loyal people, cling to traditions of the past, and have an instinctive reverence for the authority of law. How, under these circumstances, would it set about the work which it has proposed to itself, supposing it to be endowed with that astuteness for which its accusers give it credit? It would obviously take first of all to mining and sapping, far too wise to venture at once on an open assault. And what, it may be asked, would be the safest method of conducting this insidious strategy? The easiest step to begin with would be to take advantage of the popular feeling in favour of what is called the liberty of the press, and subject every action of government, every judgment of the courts of law, every principle of religion, ethics, philosophy, to an indiscriminate criticism, scattered broadcast through the length and breadth of the land. And we may imagine that the secret orders of "the Craft" would be couched in such terms as these:—Habituate the unlearned to sit in judgment on the learned, the ruled to question the acts of their rulers, the hands to arraign the heads,—train the people, uneducated and proportionally impulsive, to claim to themselves the right of forming, each one for himself, peremptory opinions upon every subject, even upon questions whose perplexity appal the wisest and most experienced,—accustom them to put themselves on a fancied mental equality with statesmen, diplomatists, legislators, judges, generals, bishops, magistrates, doctors, lawyers,—help them along this road of upstart folly by abundant use of ridicule, of sneers, contemptuous depreciation, dressed up in glittering and nervous style, directed against those who stand at the helm of government, or are found in authority of place and dignity. Much will have been gained; because modesty and self-knowledge will be thus expelled, in order to make way for a spirit of self-sufficiency and ignorant imperiousness of thought and will. After this, proceed to inoculate the masses with the idea that they are the fountain of all authority, and that the elected or hereditary legislators of the country are the mere creatures of their will and exponents of their wisdom. They will soon learn to despise quality, and value quantity; to assume as a first principle that wisdom must yield to numbers, right to might. By these means you will have well prepared the soil. Now set on foot an agitation for universal suffrage and vote by ballot,—claim a place for unlearned labour in the Senate of the nation,—inculcate the fatal notion that the task of legislation is not an onerous and responsible duty, demanding from those who undertake it exceptional qualifications, but an enviable privilege, easy and open to all, even the least informed, the fitting toy of popular caprice,—awaken a general prejudice against old forms, pageants, guilds, civic institutions, which, even when deprived of their original meaning, have nevertheless so powerful an influence in associating the feelings and imagination of a people with the traditions of a glorious past,—modernise those which, by reason of their acknowledged value, you dare not overthrow,—throw contempt and ridicule on all forms of religious belief that have strength in them enough to vindicate God's presence in the world,—put all the weights of wit, of sceptical criticism, of taking, epigrammatic style, of poetry, fiction, periodical literature, in the scale of worldliness, materialism, and a loose morality, holding, moreover, an uneven balance,—make your way with ever increasing numbers into the staff of journalists, and cease not to inoculate the public with infidel conceits and emasculated ethics, borrowed from those superficial sophists whose reputation it has been your business to create,—the people will soon be made ready for the manifestation of the light. One great difficulty, it is true, awaits us yet, and it must be overcome by gradual and stealthy action. It arises from those influences of home, that spirit of the family, which have hitherto preserved England from the contagion of a revolutionary earthquake. One important advance has been made towards its destruction. The foundation of social life has been already shaken by the recent law which has legalised divorce, and given to the civil authority a power of putting asunder those whom God has indissolubly joined together. Follow up this advantage by an agitation for women's rights,—allure them to the platform and committee-room, while you seduce them from the nursery,—rob them of the needle, and substitute the lancet or the pestle,—strip them of that retiring modesty and refinement of feeling which make them a magnet of attraction round the family hearth, and transform them into boisterous men in all but the outward dress, and it will not be long before this last hindrance will be effectually removed.

Meanwhile excite, encourage every conflict of labour with capital,—propagate trade unions, assume the direction of them wherever you can,—unite them in a general confederation, and practically affiliate them to the Craft. Miss no opportunity that may arise of bringing into contempt, and exciting popular indignation against, the authority of judge and magistrate. Lastly, never lose sight of the principle that the military forces are inimical to the success of the Masonic millennium. Direct public opinion, therefore, in favour of retrenchment, push on every measure tending to extinguish that esprit de corps which makes the English army and navy so formidable alike to external and internal enemies, and use every effort to bring the profession of arms into disrepute among the humbler classes of society. Everything is conspiring to crown our efforts, brothers of the Craft, with final success. Yet a little, and the time will have arrived for the revelation and practical realisation of our great Gnostic secret; and we shall see with our eyes the erection of our altar to the unknown on the ruins of an effete Christianity; while from out the sepulchre of buried kings, of buried governments, of a buried civilisation, shall arise the Phœnix of one undivided Republic; one universal Brotherhood, with the apron, mallet, triangle, and two mystic pillars, established for ever as the world's sole regalia.

It were here well, perhaps, to pause and examine into the present success of the designs which we have hypothetically attributed to the Masonic body.

There is a recent fact in our contemporaneous history which certainly merits the attention it has attracted. The son of a Wapping butcher undertook to personate the heir, supposed to have been drowned years ago, of an old English baronetcy. Two trials, each of an unprecedented duration, resulted in the conviction of the impostor, and his condemnation to an imprisonment of fourteen years. It would be interesting, and probably instructive, to know (if the facts could be thoroughly ascertained) by what means, and through whose active intervention, the funds were collected that were necessary to meet such gigantic expenses; but this is not the most significant point in this disreputable romance of real life. During the trial an extraordinary sympathy was enlisted in favour of Orton among the roughs of London. The fact might, perhaps, have received a probable explanation, deducible from the particular circumstances of the case, if it had not been elucidated by subsequent events. No sooner had sentence been pronounced, than the principal advocate of the prisoner commenced an agitation in favour of his release. Despite the exalted character and legal ability of all the judges connected with both trials, despite the unanimous verdict of an intelligent jury, chosen, as Mr Bright pointed out, from the middle classes, despite even of the decided judgment of the English press, alike metropolitan and provincial, which, with consentient voice, denounced the agitation and its originator, the movement gathered strength. It availed to carry the agitator, albeit just branded with the severest penalties which the legal profession could inflict on one of its members, and with an unusual token of royal displeasure, triumphantly into the Senate of the nation. The agitation spread in every quarter. Petitions were sent from different provincial towns, one signed by 11,000 persons, another by 14,000, requesting the disbarred member for Stoke to convene meetings in the several localities. A public demonstration had been previously arranged in London, and, according to the most moderate calculations, thirty or forty thousand persons responded to the summons. Now it is sufficiently notorious that the spontaneous ebullitions of a mob are not conspicuous for their organisation. One is curious, therefore, to know who prepared the petitions, marshalled the rank and file, gathered the workmen round the table, and put pen and ink in their hands after inducing them to give their names; and who they were, too, that conducted with such success the election at Stoke, and meanwhile created the extensive circulation of The Englishman.

However this may be, the facts of this humiliating drama are pregnant with warning. Dr Kenealy might have been somewhat hyperbolic in threatening us with an immediate revolution, and have justified those safe sneers at his expense which delighted a crowded House of Commons; but that he was not wide of the mark when he described us as walking gaily on the crust of an active volcano, is sufficiently plain from the commentaries which the leading journals in London have made on the proceedings. The Times, for instance, remarks, in a leading article to be found in its issue of April 26, 1875 :—

“ If the member for Stoke has completely settled the question, as it affects his client and all the parties concerned in the trial, he has also thrown not a little light on another matter of some practical importance. We must give him credit for describing what is quite within his knowledge, and what he must have special facilities for observing and estimating, when he introduces us to the majesty of the people, terribly in earnest, and not to be put off by any delays or evasions of justice. No doubt his own constituency must be the impersonation of some such majesty as he describes. That there are a good many places like Stoke-upon-Trent, and that everywhere there has been found, or could be raised, an enthusiasm for the hero of a very remarkable drama, is boasted by Dr Kenealy, and admitted by those who reply to him. It is, then, a melancholy fact, and one which Dr Kenealy has helped to bring out in striking relief and distinct form, that a very considerable, and in some places a preponderating part of the electoral body, is earnestly and passionately given to a belief and a line of action which the House of Commons, in the most solemn and decisive manner, unani- mously pronounces foolish, worthless, and mischievous. The present utter failure of the last attempt to vindicate the Claimant reacts upon all who still believe in him, or who still profess to believe in him. It warns us that there is in this sensible, sober, and calculating England, a stratum of society about as unaccountable and as little to be depended on as a quicksand or a quag- mire. There is no saying what it may be terribly in earnest about to-morrow ; and when we do see it terribly in earnest, there is no knowing whether it is terribly in earnest with good reason or for none at all,—just some nonsense of its own imagination or some object of the grossest credulity. This is a sad conclusion to come to. We wish to believe in popular earnestness, and to recognise in solemnity of tone, gravity of demeanour, and combined action, the natural vouchers for truth, reality, and sense. But if we are to believe both Dr Kenealy and the House of Commons, the majesty of the people is terribly in earnest for a creature of its imagination, or, still worse, of its own corrupt and dishonest will."

These statements are manly and outspoken: and they convey a warning which is not given a moment too soon. The Spectator for April 24, 1875, contains an article entitled, "The Orton-Kenealy Craze—Pessimist View," in which are to be found the following grave and pregnant observations:—

"The alarming side of this agitation, however, has yet to be represented. I cannot admit that, even as regards the moral side of it, it is without menace. No doubt the public mind of England has always been exceedingly susceptible to religious panic, and worse things have been done under the spell of that panic than under any other influence. But the danger of spasmodic waves of popular passion, under the spell of religious feeling, is one danger, and the danger of gross moral perversions of popular judgment, under no such spell, quite another. We can appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober in the one case; but if Philip sober is as bad as Philip drunk, then there is no such appeal possible. What has induced the people, without any spell of self-interest or passion in them, suddenly to reject the judgment of English judges as utterly untrustworthy, and to take up the cause of a man who, whether on his own or Dr Kenealy's view of him, is not a witness to be believed on his oath? . . . There has been not a little evidence of a great advance in the popularity of Orton as his asserted or admitted rascalities came out. So far from any disgust being felt at him for his assertion, or rather fabrication, of the contents of the sealed packet, his popularity definitely increased from the moment that that perjury was committed. . . . Now, is there a more dangerous form of popular sentiment than this delight in a ruffian's risks, and hopes, and excitements, in which there is not any trace of what is called 'poetical justice'? What would such a sentiment, if further developed, tend to produce? Would it not tend to produce discontent with plodding industry, an impatience for unwholesome audacities of one sort or another, a leniency towards all grandiose forms of crime, and contempt only for the squalid kind,—in short, an attitude of mind which excuses all that is wicked, if it be also interesting to the morbid imagination of persons impatient of drudgery, and which judges crime seriously only when it is on a petty scale, and therefore dull? And what temper would strike deeper at the root of English character than that? . . . . The more definitely we refer the delusion to a deliberate error of popular judgment, the more likely it seems that that error will spread itself in ever-widening circles, and result in breaking down all the buttresses against popular caprice! . . . . And what can that end in, except a growing estrangement between the people and honest political intelligence, and the lapse of politics into hands which will make political struggle a coarse and repulsive affair, from which all pure, to say nothing of fastidious, minds will shrink? . . . . Everywhere there are signs that the respect for great national institutions, for central as distinguished from local ideas, is diminishing, and that minute local notoriety has far more influence in rendering, for instance, a candidate for Parliament popular, than a great national fame. Everywhere the self-sufficiency of popular opinion is increasing, and the sources of political favour and disfavour are rapidly becoming pettier and pettier. Everywhere the difficulty of organising opinion is growing,—the residuum, aided by the ballot, realising more and more clearly that there is no true responsibility for political opinion at all, and that an arbitrary INCLINATION to accord support is at least no worse, if not a better, excuse for determining a secret vote, than a reason for thinking that that support will result in public benefit. All the signs of the times go to show that the people believe less and less that they have anything to learn from their political leaders, and indeed hold that those leaders are much rather their own instruments than their sagacious and respected advisers. . . . Look at it which way you will, it seems to promise for England a period of mean and capricious politics, in which the least scrupulous men will come to the top, and the most scrupulous and most eminent will be cowed and silenced,—in which either the House of Commons will lose control of the wild whims of the people, or the wild whims of the people will gain control of the House of Commons ;—and which of these alternatives is the worst, it is hard to say.”

The importance of the subject-matter offers an amply sufficient excuse for the length to which these quotations have been carried. These are startling facts, which are set before the reader by a paper, justly holding the foremost place among the weekly journals by reason of its talents, candour, and eminently polished as well as thoughtful articles. And here we have the volcano over whose thinly-cruste'd crater we can afford to dance and sing so merrily.

Well, then, if Freemasonry in England be the same in principle as it is confessed to be abroad, if its aims and designs be such as we have hypothetically assumed them to be, what could have been a greater godsend for the brothers of “the Craft” than this Orton-Kenealy drama? A Catholic baronet, of ancient lineage, is to be ousted of his property and title, and a Protestant butcher to be set up in his place. The legal institutions of the country, nay, the very House of Commons itself, are to be confronted with the angry denunciations and threats of the irritated masses. The Queen, too, and her Government can be reached by the movement ; for a barrister, just deprived of his silk gown by royal authority, shall be returned to Parliament by a majority that will make the election the greatest practical insult offered at once to constituted authority, to the national senate, to the majesty of the law, and to the morally unanimous verdict of educated society. Surely, if Freemasonry had such designs as are attributed to it, it could well afford to collect money, to send secret agents, to organise action for the purpose of strengthening an agitation so nearly affecting its own interests.

It would, of course, be folly to maintain that this or the other political movements which have been already referred to could have been produced solely by Masonic action. The same political sagacity which initiates a popular agitation can take adroit advantage of a temporary public sentiment, or a temporary dissatisfaction, to guide and shape both towards the promotion of its own hidden purposes. What is certain is this: that if English Freemasonry should have designs upon this and upon all other nations such as our hypothesis assigns to it, it has done its work with remarkable success during the last thirty years.

But, after all, is the hypothesis reasonable? Surely there must be some foundation for the belief, so widely spread and so persistent, that English Freemasonry is a society altogether distinct from, and independent of, the Continental Lodges. Besides, is it possible that eminent personages—including kings, princes of the blood royal, distinguished statesmen, diplomatists, men of high position and still higher character—should remain in a body whose professed object it is to overthrow the altar and to trample under foot all the crowns of Europe?

It is necessary to confront these arguments openly and plainly.

Is, then, English Freemasonry entirely disconnected with the Continental Lodges? Is it to be supposed that the Daily Telegraph, which is generally understood to represent more than any other paper the Masonic interests, would be well informed upon the point? Now, a leading article of April 28, 1875—which, judging from internal evidence, has been penned by a brother of "the Craft"—supplies us with the required information:—

"While the Craft," observes the writer in question, "contend that its rites and ceremonies date from the time when Solomon's Temple was first designed, others, apparently without data of any sort, have declared that it is an English society of some two hundred years' standing, founded much in the same fashion as were other secret conclaves, outlasting them only because its tenets were purer, and its objects nobler. Against this latter supposition there are, however, the facts that Masonry is to be found wherever human beings dwell, and that the Persian suite of the Shah found in German Lodges a congenial home, albeit that their tribes had not had Masonic communication with the Western nations for well-nigh seven hundred years. That Masons towards the close of the last century were somewhat divided is generally admitted; and that they were united under the leadership of the Duke of Sussex, who from that time forward till the day of his death ruled over the Craft, without fear of a rival, is also conceded. Be the history of this extraordinary Association, however, what it may, one thing is certain: its influence spreads all over the globe. The Emperor of Germany boasts the title of Grand Protector in the Fatherland; King Victor Emanuel, as Grand Master of Italy, bears sway in the Southern Peninsula; Denmark, Sweden, and Norway have monarchs for their Craft chieftains; Portugal and Spain, despite their allegiance to the Pontiff, boast fifty-six Lodges ; in the Netherlands, the heir to the throne sways the baton of command ; four hundred Lodges own the sovereignty of the Grand Orient of France ; the Prime Minister of Brazil is Master of his Masonic countrymen in the Argentine Republic, Hayti, San Domingo, Mexico, Uruguay, Venezuela, and Peru. The most notable of politicians are the best known of Craftsmen. Canada and the United States are proud of powerful organisations and magnificent temples ; in Greece, the ' Children of Leonidas ' hold monthly congratulation at Syra ; Masons work amid the ruins of the Piræus, a Lodge assembles in Athens ; and Patras, Corfu, and Chalcis help to swell the total of the Grand Orient of Hellas. Even Turkey contains thousands of brethren ; India can tell of Lodges by the hundred ; Australia and the South Pacific find symbols for the expression of fraternal feeling in the compass and square ; and African tribes, with wandering Arabs, claim the right to belong to this singular brotherhood."

Singular brotherhood indeed, of good sooth !
" Why have the Gentiles raged, and the people devised vain things ? The kings of the earth stood up, and the princes met together, against the Lord, and against His Christ. Let us break their bonds asunder, and let us cast away their yoke from us " (Ps. ii. 2, 3).

Making all due allowance for the tall talk of an enthusiastic Craftsman, conspicuous throughout the whole of this remarkable paragraph, two incontestable facts remain ; to wit, the universal diffusion of this dangerous and baneful confederation in all quarters of the globe, and the unity and intercommunion of all its constituent sections, however locally or nationally distinct.

But there is little need of appealing to the authority of an anonymous writer, however friendly, for the same fact is incontestably proved by the public proceedings that took place at the installation of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales as Grand Master of English Freemasons. On that occasion deputations were sent not only from the Scotch and Irish Lodges, but also from that of Sweden; while the Grand Lodge of Italy sent its congratulatory address through the well-known Brother J. C. Parkinson, and "the Grand Orient Lodge of France sent a letter of congratulation to his Royal Highness, as they had done to his predecessors in office, the Earl of Zetland and the Marquis of Ripon."—(The Times, April 29, 1875.) The Italian address is of such grave significance as to justify us in giving it in its integrity to our readers. The document is headed by the following selections from the alphabet, A.G.D.G.A.D.U., and opens with the following dedication, exactly copied from the same number of the Times. It is worth notice that those who authorised the publication of the address in that journal thought fit to conceal this introductory portion by leaving it in the original Italian. The accompanying translation will suggest a sufficient motive for a proceeding so unusual:—

"Massoneria Universale.—Communione Italiana."

"Libertà, Fratellanza, Uguaglianza."

(Liberty, Fraternity, Equality.) The reader will probably remember these watchwords in their connection with some remarkable epochs in French history.

"Grande Oriente della Massoneria in Italia e nelle Colonie Italiane."

(Grand Orient of Masonry in Italy and in the Italian Colonies.)

“ To His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of England.

“ May it please your Royal Highness to permit the Grand Master of the Grand Orient of Italy to unite the heartfelt applause of all our Italian brethren to that of our beloved brethren in England, who hail the elevation of their puissant Grand Master as one of the most auspicious and most memorable events of universal Masonry.

“ By this event English Masonry, which has already deserved so well of universal humanity, will acquire ever fresh titles to the gratitude and admiration of the whole civilised world.

“ Italian Masonry, therefore, rejoices at this new lustre shed upon our world-wide institution, and sincerely prays that between the two Masonic communities may be drawn ever more closely those fraternal ties which, through want of that official recognition which we venture to hope will soon be effected, have always bound us to our English brethren, whose profound intelligence and unwearying activity we constantly appreciate and seek to follow.

“ Accept, then, Royal Highness, with all great wishes for your continued long life and prosperity, the expression of our profound homage and fraternal affection.”

This letter, while it alludes to a present absence of official recognition by the English Freemasons of the Grand Orient of Italy, and prays that it may be granted, clearly establishes the fact that “the Brotherhood” is substantially one in all lands. It may be that the Italian Grand Lodge has not been officially recognised by the English Masons, because their Italian brothers have been imprudently premature in the revelation of the aims and action of the body, and because those ominous words, Liberty, Fraternity,

Equality, have still a somewhat ugly sound in this country.

Another significant fact, which adds to the weight of proof already given, is the appointment by "the Most Worshipful the Grand Master," after his installation, of Brother Wendt to be Grand Secretary for German correspondence.

The first objection proposed above has been, it may be presumed, sufficiently answered. There can be no reasonable doubt that there is a more or less complete solidarity between the English and Continental Lodges, and a community of aim which directs the action of the Craft in every quarter of the globe.

The next objection which has been made to the identification of English Freemasonry with those fearful tenets, and yet more fearful conspiracy of action, that are detailed in the work now placed before the reader, is derived from the roll of names, partly illustrious by position, and partly distinguished by high public and private worth, which is to be found in the archives of this Society. How is it possible that emperors, kings, and princes would persevere in lending the sanction of their name to a body, one of whose acknowledged objects it is to overthrow every throne in Europe, and extirpate all social distinctions throughout the world?

To begin with this last dilemma:—It can hardly be denied that there have been emperors and kings who have joined "the Craft," from the disheartening conviction that its power was too firmly established to be openly confronted by authority of established government; and they consequently assumed the apron with the delusive hope of being able to direct what they were unable to destroy. Others there may have been who, keenly alive to their own selfish interests, have tamely consented to cut off the entail, so to say, provided they could secure to themselves a life-interest in the regal power. But making every allowance for such cases as these, there still will remain a certain number of royal names, which cannot be included in either category. These, however, will take their place among the list of exalted and worthy personages who lend the authority of their name to this Association.

What is to be said in explanation of this fact? The reply is obvious: They have been deceived, and continue in the dark. It is thoroughly understood among the secret heads and chief agents of the body, that such brethren would not remain a single day in union with such a league if they were aware of its ultimate designs; so they have established for their convenience special degrees of honour and offices of seeming authority, where they may attract the uninitiated by the authority of their high character and exalted position, without enfeebling the secret action of "the Craft" by the demurrers of an over-scrupulous morality. The great universities of this realm are wont to confer on distinguished generals, authors, and other celebrities, the honorary degree of Doctor of Civil Law; but it is not commonly supposed that those who are selected for such a distinction have any deep knowledge of this particular branch of jurisprudence. If any one were anxious to obtain accurate information about English Freemasonry, and had received the requisite permission (as we will suppose) to get behind the veil, he would be more likely to gain his end by consulting, say, Brother Parkinson, than by submitting the Prince of Wales or the Earl of Carnarvon to his interrogatories. If any one should doubt the probability of this explanation, let him read the facts connected with Frederick, Prince of Orange, as given p. 60.

It still, however, remains to be explained how Englishmen in general should retain so strong a conviction that Freemasonry, in this country at least, is a harmless, nay, what is more, a useful and beneficent institution. That such an idea is generally entertained cannot be doubted. Thus, for instance, an article appeared in the Times (April 29, 1875), on the subject of the recent installation of the new Grand Master, in which the writer, in a tone of thinly-veiled contempt, gives expression to the judgment of popular opinion in the following terms:—

“ The installation of the Prince of Wales as Grand Master of the Freemasons was an impressive, and, in some respects, an instructive ceremonial. Theoretically, no one knows what Freemasons are, or what are their ceremonies and principles ; but in practice we all know that they are very fair representatives of Englishmen in general, and that their only peculiarity is to discharge certain praiseworthy duties of humanity in a more picturesque and expensive manner than is thought necessary by other people. We would not for a moment disparage the value of the 'Craft.' There is a singular passion in human nature for anything in the form of order, association, and discipline. Nothing of this sort can be too much for him, and in his enjoyment of the society of his fellows and of their common ceremonial, he is quite unconscious of the appearance he may present to the eyes of critical outsiders. Grown-up men, however grave, are still as happy as children in enacting some imaginary play, and, in one form or another, they insist on having it. . . . Ten thousand Englishmen wore their Masonic clothing and performed their Masonic mysteries with unprecedented effect. It was a properly innocent enjoyment, and it is pleasant to see that so many men can thus find genuine enjoyment in becoming very young again.

"But all this display seems to be the dress in which some of the best impulses of good-fellowship and charity are clothed, and as the new Grand Master yesterday said, so long as the 'great and ancient Order' confine themselves to those objects, they will flourish. 'Loyalty and charity' are their watchwords, and so long as these characteristics are maintained, they will be a useful, as well as an agreeable, Brotherhood."

This is somewhat tall writing, and, perhaps, sufficiently smart, but it can scarcely be pronounced philosophical. It is quite true that the play-element is an important constitution of our common nature; nor is it the wisest of things to aim at its suppression. It will be also easily granted that men ordinarily are attracted thereby to shows and pageants, more especially those in which themselves are engaged to take their part. But that kings, emperors, princes, eminent statesmen, diplomatists, fierce earnest demagogues, should seriously and unintermittingly lend themselves to the world-wide propagation of a show,—that Lodges should be established in every corner of the habitable globe, and seventeen millions of reasonable human beings should be united in one vast confederation, with hidden signs and passwords, sedulously concealed from the uninitiated, for the purpose of occasionally wearing queer garments and gay ribbons,—that distinguished members of the two political parties in our English Houses of Legislature should consider it consistent with their public position to be acknowledged partners in such a childish farce,<sup>1</sup>—that all the bewildering diversity of offices and grades, which have been recently exposed to the public gaze, should be accepted by an Earl of Carnarvon, a Mazzini, a Louis Blanc, a Bismarck, as so many marionettes devised for the entertainment of playgoers,—that a secret oath of the most fearful kind should be imposed upon the innocent performers of these tableaux vivants, for the mere purpose of enabling them to practise in concert the ordinary duties of “Charity and Loyalty,” is an assumption which one would hesitate to adopt, even on the authority of the Times.

However, though common sense would teach us to reject an hypothesis so baseless and untenable, it must be owned that the judgment of many wise and impartial men, no less than the persistence of a widely-spread opinion in the same direction, give colour to the assertion that Freemasonry in England has been greatly modified by the sobriety, loyal disposition, and practical solidity of our national character. We would fain hope that this may be the case; and it is only an act of justice to call attention to the fact, that the assertion receives some confirmation from the circumstance, alluded to in the Italian address of congratulation to the new Grand Master, of there being no official relations at present between the Grand Lodges of England and Italy.

Let us suppose, then, for the sake of argument, that it is true. Believe, if it so pleases you, that the Masonic "Craft" is, as actually constituted in this country, an innocent, nay, praiseworthy society, occupying itself only with the works of unostentatious charity. Even so; is the danger overpast? Is there any security that this formidable confederation may not become, when popular agitation and internal dissensions shall arise, what it has shown itself to be in other countries while they were passing through a like crisis? Can you trust the fortunes of your country and the safety of your families to men, however honourable and high-minded they may be, who have committed themselves to the guidance of an authority unknown to themselves, who are confederated under the most fearful sanctions of a secret oath, and who are compelled to an inexorable silence, even though tenets should be revealed and orders transmitted from which their innermost soul recoils with unutterable loathing? Sick at heart, driven half-mad at the revelation of the hideous secret, they dare not go back ; and, oppressed with a deadening despair, they are forced to connive at deeds which they utterly abhor.

These are not mere dreams. They are based on the evidence of stubborn facts. Read the Masonic oath, as it is given in the Irish Ecclesiastical Record for April 1875. Here it is:—

“I swear, in the name of the Supreme Architect of all worlds, never to reveal the secrets, the signs, the grips, the passwords, the doctrines, or the customs of the Freemasons ; and to preserve with respect to them an eternal silence. I promise and swear to God never to betray any of them either by writing, by word, or gesture ; never to cause them to be written, lithographed, or printed ; never to make public anything of that which has now been confided to me, or of that which shall be confided to me in the future. I pledge myself to this, and submit myself to the following penalties if I fail in keeping my word. They may burn my lips with a red-hot iron, they may cut off my hand, they may pluck out my tongue, they may cut my throat, they may hang up my dead body in a Lodge till the admission of a new brother, as a scourge for my faithlessness, and as a terrible warning to others. Then they may burn it, and cast its ashes to the winds, to the end that there may not remain a single trace of the memory of my treason. So help me God, and His Holy Gospel. Amen.”

If this be a true record,—and the respectability of the authority which gives it is a sufficient voucher for its truth,—how can any one delude himself with the idea that men bound to secrecy by such an oath can prove other than conspirators against public security ? It is no answer to produce the names of eminent and virtuous friends who are enrolled among them, and to rely on their testimony to the harmlessness of the "Craft." We firmly believe that by far the greater number are in utter ignorance of the secret designs to which they nevertheless stand committed as apprentices in the body. But they have bound themselves, blindfold, by that terrible oath; and, when the time for proof arrives, they must go on, or abide the consequences.

Moreover, it is in violation of the natural order and an ever-present menace to political stability, that a body of men should exist within the state, bound by obedience to an unknown and irresponsible authority, and shielded from all possible supervision either of constituted authority or of public opinion by an oath of secrecy. "I consider," says Lord Plunket, "an association bound by a secret oath to be extremely dangerous on the principles of the common law; inasmuch as they subtract the subject from the state, and interpose between him and his allegiance to the king." And he speaks most truly; for it is an act of high treason against the most fundamental principles of political and social life.

Finally, even should it appear that Freemasonry has been misrepresented, and that the accusations brought against it are full of exaggerations and perversions of truth (which, as we believe, the Brethren will find it difficult to prove), the fact remains, notwithstanding, that the Masonic oath, as we have already stated, is in itself a serious violation of the natural law, which forbids us to abdicate the freedom of our will in favour of an unknown and self-constituted authority, and to bind ourselves irrevocably to the propagation of tenets, or to the blind execution of orders, about which we are in utter ignorance at the time, and are therefore unable to determine whether they are consistent or not with our moral obligations to ourselves, our neighbour, and our God.

Let those, then, who read this little work beware lest, out of an evil and unhealthy curiosity, they be induced to despise the voice of conscience, and to prepare for themselves, as so many unhappily have done before them, a life of misery, terror, and unavailing remorse. It is far wiser to remain in a safe and contented ignorance than to plunge into unknown dangers, and to refuse the temporal advantages which Freemasonry can undoubtedly secure, but only at the expense of that inestimable peace which fortifies us to endure with cheerfulness the troubles of this life, and assures us of that eternal bliss in the future of which it is itself a partial, though imperfect, instalment.

AFTER the above introduction had been written, a most valuable contribution to our contemporary literature, touching the subject of this volume, from the accomplished pen of Monsignor Dupanloup, Bishop of Orleans, has come to hand. Any one who is interested in this most momentous question—as who is not?—should possess himself of the “Étude sur la Franc-Maçonnerie.” It will prove of special interest to the English reader, since the proofs as to the real designs of Freemasonry in Germany, and generally on the Continent, collected in the present work and in the Bishop’s brochure from the most authentic sources, are confirmed by the avowals of English Freemasons which have been published in the London journal devoted to their interests.

The evidence contained in the Bishop’s pamphlet gives such marked sanction to the course of thought pursued in the above preface, and so completely justifies the hypothesis therein developed, that the latter might be supposed to have been suggested by an attentive perusal of the former; and, though the suspicion is in fact groundless, this correspondence between the two gives greater weight to both, for the very reason that it is purely accidental.

One of the principal objects to which Freemasonry throughout Europe is directing its most strenuous efforts, in preparation for the final construction of its atheistic republic, is the establishment in every nation of compulsory State education, from which all religious instruction shall be rigorously excluded. In 1864, as the Bishop of Orleans narrates, a scheme of legislation issued from the Grand Orient of Belgium, drawn up in the form of twenty-three articles. The first two are couched in the following terms : 1. Suppression of all religious instruction ; 2. Obligation on the part of the father and widowed mother to force their children to the school " (1. Suppression de toute instruction religieuse ; 2. Obligation pour le père et pour la mère veuve, de conduire de force ses enfants à l'école). " The London Masonic journal, in reply to the Lodge at Antwerp, the Grand Orient of Belgium, and The Rose of Perfect Silence in Paris, declares that religious education is a poison, and consequently requires 'that parents should engage to withdraw their children from the virus of religious education.'"<sup>1</sup>

Who, then, can possibly doubt that such is the aim of Freemasonry here, as on the Continent? And, if we duly estimate the preponderance of Freemasonry in both Houses of our Legislature, and its profession by eminent and influential personages belonging to our two great political parties, the success of this educational scheme can be, humanly speaking, only a question of time. If some one of our representatives would move for a list of all persons connected in any way with Government, and of members of either House, who are enrolled in this secret Society, the revelation might, perhaps, awaken public opinion to a sense of the perils by which we are surrounded. No one could, of course, suppose for one moment that any great number of our statesmen would be acquainted with the ultimate intentions of "the Craft;" if they were, they would not continue their connection with it for a day. The reader's attention has been already called to the fact that the full revelation is confided to comparatively few; while by far the greater majority remain either in total or in partial ignorance of designs to whose success they are unconsciously contributing. The Bishop of Orleans calls especial attention to the fact, and quotes the words of a distinguished Freemason, M. Louis Blanc, in proof. The testimony of this writer is so conclusive on the point, that its insertion here will require no apology. "It seemed good to sovereigns, to Frederick the Great, to handle the trowel and to put on the apron. Why not? Since the existence of the higher grades was carefully hidden from them, all they knew of Freemasonry was that which could be revealed to them without danger. They had no reason for concerning themselves about it, seeing that they were kept in the lower grades, in which they perceived nothing but an opportunity for amusement, joyful banquets, principles forsaken and resumed at the threshold of the Lodges, formulas that had no reference to ordinary life,—in a word, a comedy of equality. But, in these matters, comedy closely borders upon tragedy; and the princes and nobles were induced to offer the cover of their name and the blind aid of their influence to secret undertakings directed against themselves." <sup>1</sup>

Can any reasonable man doubt, after reading an explicit admission such as this from one who knew well what he was saying, that kings, princes, statesmen, legislators, may be found in grades of high honour and dignity, provided by Freemasonry for their especial benefit,—may assume the first place in its public manifestations and the external direction of its government, and may yet remain in ignorance of its hidden designs as unconscious and complete as is that of the profane who are altogether excluded from its Lodges? Not without reason, therefore, has Leo XII. warned its unhappy dupes that, "Though it is not the custom to reveal what is most blamable in it to those who have not reached the high grades, it is notwithstanding plain that the power of these Societies, so dangerous to religion, is augmented in proportion to the number of their adherents."<sup>2</sup> The present Pope, in his allocution of September 25, 1865, incidentally bears witness to the same fact; for, speaking of previous monitions given by his predecessors, he remarks, "Unhappily these admonitions have not had the desired effect, and we have therefore considered it our duty to condemn this Society once more, seeing that, perhaps out of ignorance, the false opinion might arise that it is inoffensive, that its only aim is the practice of charity, and that consequently it could not be a source of danger to the Church of God.”<sup>1</sup>

One thing is certain. It is a mortal sin for a Catholic to belong to it. It is almost as certain that no one who professes to be a Christian can join its ranks without peril to his salvation. Strange though it may seem, Freemasons have themselves confessed as much. For, when the Bishop of Autun affirmed that, “If a man wished to remain a sincere Christian he could not at the same time be a Freemason,” the Monde-Maçonnique, the Paris organ of Freemasonry, openly admitted that “The Bishop is justified in speaking thus. He is in his right. It is his duty.”<sup>2</sup>

THE SECRET WARFARE.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTION.

THE war against throne and altar has broken out along the whole line. Liberalism in all its varied hues, from peaceful Blue to fiery Red, is now master of the field. Those monarchies which yield to its sway allow themselves, half involuntarily, to drift with the stream, and will find themselves, notwithstanding the protestations of devoted loyalty uttered by the party in power, inevitably stranded on Republicanism. Not, however, the Republicanism of Lamartine in 1848, but that of social democracy. Such a result is doubly surprising, because the party referred to is universally acknowledged to lack intellect and union. The only explanation of it is furnished by the organisation which conceals itself behind Liberalism, namely, the Secret International Society of Freemasons. This body, protected by exceptional laws in its favour, has during the last two centuries made such rapid strides, that it can boast a brotherhood numbering seventeen millions.<sup>1</sup> It is notorious that to it belong the principal members of the Liberal Ministries of Italy, Spain, Portugal, France, Belgium, and other countries; to it are associated the most formidable democratic agitators, and the leaders of the Liberal parties in Parliaments: whilst the Liberal Press, consciously or unconsciously, is everywhere its instrument. This work has long been in preparation, and has been brought by tenacious perseverance to its present flourishing condition. One of the initiated writes thus:—"The greatest and wisest men have bestowed on our Society a constitution which gives lasting proof of their sagacity. Shrouded in threefold night, we move among our adversaries, and, unseen by them, acquaint ourselves with their weak points, thus acquiring the mastery over their mind and heart. We use their passions as wires, whereby, without their being aware of the fact, we set them in motion, compelling them to work in union with us, whilst they ignorantly imagine themselves to be merely gratifying their own wishes. It would be unwise to engage in open warfare; the spread of freedom of thought and independence of action is the surest means of undermining the gigantic monument erected by ambition. Under the very shadow of authority, the Mason works at the mighty task committed to him. Freemasonry, great and terrible, dogs your steps, spies out your proceedings, reads the thoughts of your inmost soul, watches you when you imagine yourself enveloped in impenetrable darkness. Its hidden and irresistible influence shatters your plans, its powerful arm wrests the dagger from your grasp. With your help, brethren, it will strike off the chains which still bind the peoples of the earth.”<sup>1</sup>

We are very far from reckoning the entire Liberal party, with all its members, as Masonic brethren, or charging all Freemasons with consciously carrying out the designs of their Secret Society; on the contrary, we are convinced that the transactions related in the following pages will probably give umbrage to some of our readers, themselves members of this mysterious association, since they have as yet heard of nothing of the kind in their Lodges. This, however, in no way affects the question, for the duties of all the members are not confined to contributing money and attending at banquets. Further, it is not a valid objection to say that since ruling princes and members of their family have joined the Masonic Lodges, the regard which is due to them imparts a treasonable character to every word condemnatory of the Secret Society.<sup>1</sup> The very birds on the housetops know that rulers and princes, even if they are outwardly invested with the highest dignities in the various Lodges, are never Working Masons or Architects, but Master Builders, and therefore stand in exactly the same relation to their Lodge in which a rich proprietor, who desires to have a splendid mansion erected for him, stands to the contractor of the works, whose aim it is to become even a richer man than the proprietor himself. Noble natures—to their credit be it spoken—are always the easiest to deceive; no one is more difficult to take in than a thorough-paced rascal. Let us, therefore, not be accused of disloyalty towards those royal personages who have done Freemasonry the honour to enrol themselves among its members ; our remarks will apply only to the Architects who keep out of sight, not to any who may be their Patrons.

And in fact it is high time to raise our voice, for a great part of the Catholic body, in spite of signs which thicken daily, refuse to see anything in Freemasonry but a harmless convivial meeting of Liberal bon-vivants, or, at most, a secret association distracted by internal dissensions.<sup>1</sup> This opinion, which may perhaps formerly have had an appearance of justice, is no longer tenable, the gravity of the situation becoming every day more apparent. Dr Ketteler, the Bishop of Mayence, in his pamphlet on "Liberty, Authority, and the Church" (pp. 218, &c.), says very aptly :—"The position claimed by Freemasonry throughout the whole world is a peculiarly and radically exceptional one. It alone is never, except in rare instances, discussed by the Press ; indeed, it refuses to allow itself to be so discussed. Although priests openly deliberate and pronounce upon all other points affecting the general interests of mankind ; although Christianity, with its system and doctrines, the State with its laws and constitutions, are topics of free discussion ; although even the most intimate and personal concerns of individuals are made public—Freemasonry alone, by the universal consent of Europe, is acknowledged to be a Noli me tangere! Every one shrinks from speaking of it as of an uncanny ghost. This phenomenon is an obvious proof of the immense power Freemasonry exercises in the world.”

In the following pages we propose to treat of the covert warfare waged by this secret league—1st, Against the Catholic Church ; 2dly, against Christianity ; 3dly, against Monarchy ; 4thly, against Social Order ; and 5thly, against God Himself. We quote for the most part from records and well-authenticated utterances of the Lodges themselves, and shall studiously avoid all exaggeration, not allowing our deductions to go one whit further than the evidence adduced compels us to do.

CHAPTER II.

THE COVERT WARFARE CARRIED ON BY THE SECRET SOCIETY AGAINST THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

WE do not intend entering upon the history of Freemasonry, for to do so would lead us to overstep the limits of the task we have undertaken; we would only observe that writers on this subject frequently fall into one of two extremes. Some trace back the history of the League to the fratricide Cain, and thus give what is rather an account of the origin and development of evil amongst mankind in general,<sup>1</sup> while others assert the Secret Society to have been first set up in England by a natural philosopher named Desaguliers, a theologian called James Anderson, and one George Payne, although it is undeniable that documents exist of an earlier date.<sup>2</sup> Those writers are most to be trusted who trace its origin back to the Jewish Synagogue during the Christian era. This view is confirmed by the whole tenor of the accessory legends of Freemasonry, as well as by its general character and ultimate object. The name it bears,

As the aim of this society is to supplant Christianity, to usurp its place as far as external and internal power is concerned, secretly to bring everything in Church and State, in the community and the family, as well as matters of opinion and custom, into subjection to itself, and to establish itself amongst mankind as the supreme and sovereign bond of union, as the so-called "kingly craft," it becomes self-evident that such an association must be the natural enemy of that cosmopolitan society founded by the Son of God, the Catholic Church.

I. Above all things, this hostility makes itself felt in the domain of faith. The treasure of revealed truth, the deposit of the faith (vide 1 Tim. vi. 20), has ever been the Church's choicest jewel, and to preserve this intact has been the chief object of her existence. Throughout untold difficulties and struggles innumerable with the delusions of perverse minds, she has proved equal to her task, permitting whole nations to lapse from her maternal arms rather than yield up one iota of her trust. She holds faith to be the root and foundation of justification, the sure guide of daily life, and she pledges her children to defend the least of her dogmas at the cost, if need be, of their life. A far-reaching chain of martyrs proves that she has been understood and obeyed. And yet if we listen to the apologists of Freemasonry, they would have us believe no institution to be more tolerant of and considerate towards the Church than their own. In the German Quarterly Magazine (1841, No. 1) a "brother" goes as far as possible in this respect, saying—"It (the Society of Freemasonry) has always been able to steer clear of any active interference in political or ecclesiastical matters, and to recover its original glorious path, if influences external to itself have for a short time caused it to swerve aside." Plausible words like these were certainly not out of place as long as old-fashioned governments maintained to some extent their Christian character; as long as they abstained from unceremoniously and publicly undermining the faith, although their administration often checked and hindered the free action of the Church. But times are now altogether changed, and the Secret Society is now no longer compelled to wear any such disguises; it can fearlessly avow and carry into practice that hatred to the Catholic faith which was born with it, and which its written records long ago expressed. We will begin by referring to one of the oldest of these.

The celebrated document executed at Cologne in 1535, to which we find the signature of Philip Melancthon appended in his character of brother of the Order of Freemasons, asserts the existence of a secret society extending over every part of the world, and called previous to the year 1440 by the name of "Confraternity of St John," but after that date, and up to 1535, known under the appellation of "Free-asons of St John," or "Fellowship of Freemasons." A reform of this society took place in 1717, whereby, while its original aims remained unchanged, it assumed a more atheistic and democratic shape, modelling its ritual after the modern English "Book of Constitutions." (Vide Eckert, "Mysteries of Heathendom," p. 329.) The following paragraph, taken from the Cologne document, stands under the heading A :—"The confraternity of Freemasons united in the Holy Rule of St John derives its origin neither from the Templars, nor from any other Order of Knights, whether temporal or spiritual, but is older than all such Orders, having existed in Palestine and Greece, as well as in both divisions of the Roman Empire, before the time of the Crusades. Our brotherhood was already in existence at the time when, on account of the strife of sects respecting Christian ethics (!), a small number of initiated persons, who were acquainted with the true doctrines of morality, and with the correct interpretation of esoteric teaching, severed themselves from the mass. For at that time those learned and enlightened men, true Christians who had kept themselves perfectly free from every infection of heathen error, believed that a religion which was tainted with heresy could only be a source of discord, and never of union. On this account they took a solemn oath, binding themselves to preserve henceforth more pure and undefiled the fundamental truths of this religion, which, conducive as they are to virtue, are indigenious to the human mind, and to devote themselves entirely to this object, in order that the true light might gradually emerge from the darkness, and dispel the mists of superstition ; that thus the peace and prosperity of mankind might be established on a firm basis, through the regular practice of all natural virtues."

Under B we read :—" Although in the exercise of our beneficent influence we admit no restriction of creed or country, we have nevertheless hitherto considered it necessary, as a precautionary measure, to receive no one into our brotherhood who, when mixing in ' profane ' and unenlightened circles of society, is not prepared to profess himself a Christian." At the close of the document stand the words, " 1535, according to the era called by the name of the Christian Era."

By these unimpeachable documents<sup>1</sup> the whole position of Freemasonry in its hostility to the Catholic faith is clearly shown.

1. It refuses to recognise in the earlier heresies anything more than disputes about Christian morality, although, as a matter of fact, these heresies almost invariably had reference to some point of dogma ; consequently their importance, as bearing on matters of faith, is studiously ignored, set aside as unimportant and contemptible, or else their very existence is denied.

2. The Church is placed on the same level with the sects.

3. Religious truth, it is alleged, can be found neither in the Catholic Church nor in the sects, but exclusively among a small number of the initiated, viz., the old Freemasons, who had separated themselves from the majority—that is to say, from the unity—of the Church.<sup>1</sup>

4. The true knowledge possessed by these men professes, however, to consist only in moral teaching; consequently, religious dogma is openly represented as mere folly; a toy to amuse the vulgar crowd.

5. Even their morality itself is not derived from revelation, but calls itself the “natural product of the human mind.”

6. The Catholic Church is said to be infected with pagan error and disfigured by false doctrine; hence she becomes the parent of strife amongst men, and can never give peace to the world.

7. Thus (and this is the necessary inference of what has gone before) every one initiated in the secret teaching pledges himself to combat the Catholic superstition with all his might, and to establish peace and prosperity amongst mankind by means of purely natural religion.

Such are the terrible designs of this dark sect. Have we then gone too far in imputing to Freemasons a deadly enmity to the Catholic faith? Can it be said that the English edition of the Rules issued in 1717 is couched in more moderate terms? By no means. It is precisely in regard to this essential element of Masonry that its Conservatism is specially manifested; behind this smooth-sounding phraseology lurks the old hatred of the faith. The following are indicated as the chief duties and fundamental principles of the Freemason (Anderson's "Book of Constitutions," Frankfort, 1743, p. 298, &c.) :—"As a true Noachite, the Mason is obliged to conform to the Moral Law; and if he rightly understands his craft, he will neither be an atheist, nor openly irreligious and dissolute. It is now considered expedient, in contrast to the usages of former days" (charming fiction!), "to pledge the Masons to hold such religious beliefs only as all men share in common—that is, to return to the earliest form of Catholic (!) Christianity, calling on them to be good and true, honourable and upright men, and to observe all such reasonable commands of morality as meet with universal acceptance. Meanwhile each individual member is left free to adhere to his own particular form of religious opinion; all controversies and disputes about religion and politics are prohibited, and the Masons are desired to live as peaceable citizens, in obedience to the civil authorities. Nevertheless, a Brother who may have taken part in an insurrection against the State, without being guilty of any other offence, is not on this account cut off from connection with his Lodge. One essential law for all the members is that of brotherly love, mutual help and fidelity ; each is bound to look upon the others in the light of equals and brothers, and upon the whole society as a fellowship of humanity, philanthropy, tolerance, and friendly intercourse."

It must immediately strike the thoughtful reader that the Mason, considered in his character of Noachite, not as the adherent of any positive religion, is bound to observe such laws of reason and morality only as are universally recognised as binding, and to be honourable and upright in his dealings. In regard to everything else, he may, from prudential motives, join in the outward observances of the religious body of which he is a professed member, or of whatever party expediency may point out to be the best ; for instance, in England he will be an Anglican, in Prussia a Protestant, at Rome a Catholic, in Turkey a Mohammedan ; for, to speak more plainly, all positive religion is an empty form. If, however, the Mason is a man of uprightness and honour, he must, for consistency's sake, strive with all his might to set his fellow-men free from religious errors,—that is to say, from the mistake of having any religion at all. Hence, according to the very just remarks of Jarcke ("Miscellaneous Writings," vol. 2, "Essay on the Creed of the Illuminati") :—"When Freemasonry was founded for the second time, it at once assumed a position of definite hostility to all that is positive in the dogmas and forms of Christianity, for the task it then proposed to itself was by no means limited to uniting all its members, belonging to different Christian bodies, in the bond of civil and social unity, and bringing to bear on their external life the humanising influences of friendly intercourse. On the contrary, from the very first it set its face boldly in the direction of Indifferentism and Deism,<sup>1</sup> keeping in its own hands the power of regulating all that is positive in the belief of its Christian members, whilst allowing them outwardly to conform to any religious creed or opinion; since the only religion to which they were virtually pledged was a nominal one, reduced to a hollow form, drained of vital faith, and consisting merely of those universal laws of reason and morality on which all men are agreed." It is self-evident that the immediate result of views like these must be war to the knife against the Catholic Church and her sacred creed. Were she but once overthrown, the fragments severed from her in bygone times, the so-called sects, must inevitably share her fate, and then the dogmas of the "honourable man," the "universal religion of mankind," could drive its triumphal car over her ruins all round the world. Formerly it was sought to undermine faith by cold indifference, by assuming the disguise of an angel of light, and professing a certain general Christianity. All this, however, is no longer needed; in the present day hypocrisy is a superfluous trouble, for the Speculative or Blue Lodge equals the Red in its bold avowal of enmity to the Catholic faith. As far back as 1841, the Freemason quoted above writes in the German Quarterly Magazine:—"The necessity of counteracting the influence exercised by Jesuits, and other opponents of the march of intellect, did perhaps render concealment needful at first, and the conscience of many an orthodox Catholic could only be set at rest by departing from our old simple ideal. For we must do the Roman Church the justice to say that she recognised the true aim and wide scope of the league, as well as its great importance, more clearly and at an earlier date than many of its members themselves, and held to her opinion with greater tenacity than they did." In order more fully to convince our readers, we will bring forward some additional testimony.

The "Journal of Freemasonry, printed for circulation among the Brothers" (Altenburg, 1823, i. 1, p. 95, seq.), contains the following passages:—"The form of government or organisation of a Lodge realises the most perfect system possible; the constitution is democratic and the government representative. The members are divided into three classes—youths, men, and elders. The brotherhood is to be cemented by uniting the members of various religious bodies in natural religion, by equality of rights and claims, by common pleasures and common action in the interests of philanthropy."

In the Vienna "Freemason's Journal, for circulation among the Brothers," ii., 3, p. 21, the Speaker of the Lodge thus addresses the Brothers: "In early times the inhabitants of Samothracia worshipped only the heaven and the earth, because Nature was father and mother to them, and there were then neither priests nor despots to make them misjudge and hate their divine parent, by craft and by force, by means of superstition and oppression, by inward and outward coercion." On the reception of a Lutheran preacher in Vienna, according to the same journal (ii. 3, p. 184), the following was sung:—

"What is there to choose between cross of gold
Or breastplate as worn by high priest of old?
What if grass-green turban, adorned with lace,
Or more elegant mitre the forehead grace?
Whether Pope of Rome his allegiance claim,
Or pope of a place less well-known to fame,
Of Hamburg or Stamboul, what matters the name?"

The "Latomia" (vol. xii. p. 168) represents another speaker as addressing the Brothers in a somewhat similar strain:—"It is just as one-sided to be a Catholic as a Lutheran, a Quaker, &c. The educated man, especially the Mason, must be entirely free from any such party-colouring."

II. A league which is diametrically opposed to the Catholic faith, and has shown implacable hostility towards it, cannot fail to prove an equally bitter opponent where questions of morality are concerned. By its own admission, it obliges its members to observe those rules only of reason and morality which meet with universal recognition. But, in the name of Heaven, how inconceivably wide that cloak of morality must be, beneath whose folds the Chinese adorer of Confucius and the Buddhist Malay, the heathen Indian and the Turk, the fire-worshipping Parsee and the Rationalist of the first water, the Catholic and the Calvinist, can dwell together and join hands in brotherly love! It is our firm persuasion that the League does not understand a single one of the Ten Commandments in the same sense as the Catholic Church, and that the fair dealing even of "the honourable man" would suffer shipwreck, as soon as Church property—and other property too—had to be dealt with. Even the panegyrist of Freemasonry in the German Quarterly Magazine referred to above, cannot entirely succeed in hiding its moral nakedness when he writes in its exculpation:—"Whilst it leaves dogmas untouched, and teaches that every external respect and honour be paid to the different forms of belief, the brotherhood derives its spirit from the highest teaching of all, as proclaimed by its illustrious founder—a teaching which is, alas! too openly misunderstood—and which it endeavours to reduce to practice, and make fruitful in daily life. Freemasonry may be termed the religion of the full-grown man." But of what nature can be this morality of the full-grown—i.e., the completely independent—man, which, to use a common expression, puts both God and Beelzebub out of the question? Much the same as that of the late Grand Master Mazzini, who would give the dagger into the hand of the man he was about to send out on an errand of death, and afterwards praise the assassin for having one of those strong natures which allows the influence of no third person to interfere between himself and his conscience. The following important admission, found in an official apology for the association, is remarkably similar:<sup>1</sup>—"Freemasonry teaches how to be virtuous without the stimulus of hope or fear, independently alike of heaven and hell! The Mason looks for no future reward; he has received his recompense in the present, and is therewith content." In other words, as there is neither heaven nor hell, consequently neither eternal reward nor eternal punishment, the actions of men are unshackled; we need only have due regard to time and place, in order not to damage our reputation as respectable members of society. Thus Freemasonry carries us at one bound far back behind the ancient Paganism of Greece and Rome in respect to matters of morality. There is no Elysium to attract, no Tantalus to terrify; man is absolute master of his own belief and actions. Every one is a usurper who issues laws restricting the unfettered liberty which is every man's right, or prescribing the course he should take. With such premisses, it was easy for the writer in the German Quarterly Magazine already referred to, to say that Freemasonry was a League which had rendered itself illustrious by producing results such as cannot fail to be brought about by a League having for its object to unite together that which States, Churches, and social grades are the means of dividing, and to sing its praises as having triumphantly succeeded in levelling the boundary walls which so sharply define the different religious creeds. What attitude must this mode of viewing things cause it to assume in regard to Catholic morality? How will it look on the laws of self-denial, of mortification of the evil passions in the human heart, of Christian humility and purity, of obedience and forgiveness, and, above all, of that fairest blossom the Church can show—the evangelical counsels?<sup>1</sup> Must not the saints, those great heroes of the Church, appear fools in its eyes? Yes, we need not wonder if the apostles of this dark League speak of “pernicious Jesuit morality,” and show for Gury’s “Handbook of Morals” an abhorrence as strong as that shown by the Devil for holy water. They hug themselves in the fond belief that the <sup>1</sup> On the occasion of the consecration of the Lodge Mataram in Djokdjokarta (Dutch possessions in India), the presiding Brother (Van Hengel) spoke thus on the second light being kindled—“Mataram, be strong and mighty! Be a bulwark against the inroads of prejudice, folly, and superstition. May this light guide you in the conflict on which you will soon have to enter.”—Jaarboekje voor Nederlandsche Vrijmetselaren, 5872 (1872), p. 156.

E. Eckert, Barrister in Dresden, Leipzig, 1852." To repel these charges a great Convention of the Order had been held, the Grand Master of Germany himself being present, at which an apologetic address for the benefit of the less-instructed brethren was delivered. It appeared under the above title. Cf. Eckert "On the Question of the Recognition of Freemasonry by the State," 2d ed., Vienna, 1862, p. 45.

Church, with all her dogmas and precepts, has been barren of results ;<sup>1</sup> and that their League has been the first to do something for the amelioration of mankind. But they deceive themselves, and, as we think, with their eyes open. The Catholic Church was, and still is, abundantly productive of the highest moral perfection ; not, however, in the case of those who allow their passions to legislate for them. We must not anticipate, otherwise we might here point out the moral abyss into which Freemasonry would precipitate the human race. This subject is reserved for our eighth chapter.

III. From what has been said, the tremendous hatred of Freemasonry to the Church follows as a natural consequence. It owes its origin, to all appearances, to rabbinic animosity against the Son of God, put to death on the first Good Friday. The Cologne document of 1535 boasts the signatures of Philip Melancthon, of the unhappy Hermann von <sup>1</sup> Menzel, in his "Neuere Geschichte der Deutschen," v. 10, p. 312, Breslau, writes in a similar strain :—"It was the endeavour of Freemasons to recast in the mould of their Brotherhood those bonds of common interest in spiritual matters which had been slackened under ecclesiastical government, if not completely severed by schism, and converted into causes of discord. They hoped by means of mysterious rites to divert that love of dogmas and symbols which is easily excited in the human breast, away from the conflicting current of ecclesiastical opinions into the safe channel of a morality founded on reason. In fact, they aimed at supplanting the inefficient doctrines and rites of the Church by sound moral principles and social intercourse." This passage acknowledges the unconcealed warfare of the Lodge against Christian dogma, especially as presented in its most positive form by the Catholic Church.

Wied, then Elector of Cologne, and of Coligny, the leader of the French Huguenots. Those by whom Christians were most cruelly persecuted during the first French Revolution were all Freemasons; and every subsequent act of violence directed against the Catholic Church has either been instigated by Freemasons, or has at least met with their approval and moral support. At all events, as long as their endeavour was, in strictly Catholic countries like Austria and Bavaria, where Catholicism was upheld by law and was the religion of the State, to destroy the power of the hierarchy, slowly undermining it through the tenacious perseverance of centuries, they spoke in a high strain of the respect to be shown by every true Freemason to dogma and forms of belief; tolerance was lauded as the fairest jewel in the crown of princely or civilian virtue;<sup>1</sup> and under cover of such words they sought gradually to blunt the edge of Catholic fervour, and prepare the way for the introduction of error. And if from time to time an open attack was made on the Catholic phalanx, the plea urged was the necessity of "counteracting Jesuits and other opponents of progress." But now the day of concealment is past; the Church of Christ and the bastard offspring of darkness stand face to face, with visors raised. Edgar Quinet, a "Brother," openly and boldly declares: "The Catholic religion must be stifled in the mire."<sup>1</sup> Thus we find the Lodges of both hemispheres uniting with the revolutionary Cæsarism which assaults the Church, everywhere directing their efforts to effect the separation of Church and State, and the banishment of religion from everyday life, to introduce undenominational education, under the supervision of the State alone, as well as civil marriage; in a word, to build up a State without God. In order to be able to oppose confessors from the realm of darkness to the confessors of Christianity, who should be the avowed offspring of Freemasonry, the sect of the "Solidaires" was formed; and since the funeral obsequies of Brother Verhaegen at Brussels, it has celebrated its apotheosis of hatred and contempt of the Church not only in Belgium, but in the Free States of America, in France, and in the Eternal City itself. When the more aristocratic member of the Lodge fears to soil his hands, he calls in the assistance of his plebeian step-brother from the affiliated Societies ; for occasions constantly occur in public life when the bepraised lower orders prove useful in doing dirty work, as, for instance, forcing a majority in the Chambers in order to turn out the Catholic Ministry in Belgium. If a Government, such as the Austrian was up to 1866, refuse to enact anything injurious to Christianity, it is subjected to a series of annoying attacks from the press, and other more influential agencies, until in very desperation it consents to deliver over the Bride of Jesus Christ to the unchivalrous Knights of the Secret Society.

This hatred descends to the simple details of everyday life, not scorning even to pry into a railway coupé, the unfortunate priesthood having to bear the brunt of its most furious persecutions, as shown by the infamous lies of the "Chronique Scandaleuse," and by the thousand difficulties daily experienced in the performance of all religious functions. To preach the truths of the faith is deemed folly, since religion is defined to be the practice of morality ; to insist on a Christian life is deemed intolerance ; and the refusal to yield up rights common to all is branded as love of power. Only the tepid, unorthodox, and worldly priest is considered a true representative of his class, and deserving of preferment. And with all their hellish hatred of the Catholic Church, the "Brothers" have yet the effrontery to complain that they are "hunted down on all sides like wild beasts by royal avarice and Ultramontane fury.”<sup>1</sup> If the crying intolerance of which they are guilty be pointed out to them, they become piously indignant over such a rash judgment, asserting that they highly esteem real religion, and only take up arms against “prejudice, folly, and superstition;” not being, of course, honest enough to confess that with these three opprobrious epithets they intend to designate our Holy Church. But cowardly hypocrisy and equivocation are ever the heritage of all Secret Societies.

Religious Orders are the fairest flowers in the Church’s garden. Even an Order which has lost somewhat of its early fervour is always a great support to Catholic life, and a powerful agent for good. How much more does this apply to a zealous religious body! And as in the present day it is only zeal that enables the Orders to hold their ground, they are the object of the bitter hatred of Freemasonry. In speaking before one of the Lodges of Brussels, “Brother” Boulard declared that he would like to do away with convents and monks altogether, even though recourse to main force might be requisite. This intolerant utterance, at variance with the professed principles of the Society, was greeted with a deafening burst of applause.<sup>2</sup> A precisely similar onslaught on religious orders was begun in Austria by the Freemasons of that country in the time of the unhappy and misguided Joseph II., and was unfortunately only too successfully carried out. In order more thoroughly to uproot the Catholic Church, it was necessary to put a stop to the influence exercised by convents over the education of the rising generation upon Christian life in the world. For this end a host of infamous writers employed lies, calumnies, and contempt, representing places consecrated to the life of perfection to be abodes of darkness and superstition, thus to make their spoliation and destruction more sure. Amongst these writers, the founder of the Vienna Lodge of "True Unity," named Born, a member of the Imperial Council, and personal friend of the Emperor, distinguished himself by his cynical hatred and unscrupulous mendacity.<sup>1</sup> With him, and

<sup>1</sup> In his infamous "Monachologia," for instance, he thus expresses himself: "The race of monks may be divided into three families, viz., those who eat flesh, those who eat fish and flesh, and those who eat fish alone. A monk may be described as a creature resembling man, who wears a cowl, howls at night, and is always thirsty. Man is possessed of speech, reason, and will; the monk is dumb at times, and is devoid of judgment or will. Man gains his bread in the sweat of his brow; the monk fattens in idleness. Man dwells among his fellow-men; the monk loves solitude and shuns the light. Hence we see that the monk is a species of mammal differing from man, a kind of cross-breed between men and monkeys, most like the latter, since speech and food scarcely suffice to distinguish him from them. How much he resembles the ape, that most hideous creation in the animal kingdom! The use of the monk is this,—to fill space and to eat." This lampoon, written in Latin, and afterwards translated into German, was distributed in thousands by the "Brethren," and, as a matter of course, reckoned among "the most famous products of the human mind." Cardinal Migazzi, Archbishop of Vienna, presented to the under him, throughout the wide provinces of the Danube, Apprentices, Fellow-crafts, and Master-masons worked on the same plan, bringing upon Austria the evils under which it still smarts. Similar effects springing from the same causes are to be seen in our own day. The outburst against Jesuits in Germany is the work of the Lodges, whose fury will soon extend to all other religious communities in the Church; the final results—so these hellish adversaries are fain to hope—will follow as a matter of course.

For ecclesiastical dignitaries, especially the bishops and the Pope, no better fate has been reserved by the King a memorial couched in most moderate terms, but to no avail. On this account Joseph II. met with most enthusiastic applause from the Freemasons, e.g., "Were Christ to come to earth again, the first thing He would do would be to betake Himself to Vienna to seek out the great Joseph; He would fall on his neck, embrace him tenderly, and say, 'Dear Joseph, My beloved son, thou art he whom My Heavenly Father has placed as a sovereign upon the earth in order to restore to its primeval splendour My holy religion, which the godless monks and priests who, perhaps, wish to crucify Me anew, have defaced with a thousand superstitions. Thou, Joseph, art the man chosen by My Father for this important work, and since neither the Pope, My representative, nor the bishops, will support thee, as their duty binds them to do, in thy ordinances and wise appointments, I have been sent once more to earth to give a helping hand to the undertaking.'" By the way we may remark, that nothing tends more to trample majesty into the dust, and render it contemptible, than clumsy flattery of this sort, the folly of which must be apparent to the simplest man among the people. "Brother" Ratschky congratulates the Emperor on his conquest over "that hydra of monasticism, and because the greatest prince now occupying a German throne protects Freemasonry with his shield."—Cf. Seb. Brunner, Die Mysterien der Aufklärung in Oesterreich, 1770, 1800, from archives and other sources hitherto untouched. Mayence, 1809. Also, "Theologische Dienerschaft am Hofe Joseph II." Both works are worth reading at the present time.

Secret Societies, since the shepherds must first be slain before the sheep of the flock can be scattered far and wide. Let us confine our attention to the past, as to-day is but a development of yesterday. In 1781, when Joseph II. sat upon the throne, the Austrian "Brothers" first began to pour their flood of unmitigated contempt upon the best bishops of the realm. While they mutually extolled one another as "men of honour," they made furious sallies against all "opponents of the light, against priestly rogues and deceivers," demanding that the Emperor should put down these "good-for-nothing clerical Mandarins, and unearth the political moles who were burrowing under the State with their crooked ways and cross-grained faces."<sup>1</sup> Hence we see that the hostile sentiments with which the clergy were credited were punishable even then, and that priests were considered to be dangerous to the State (staatsgefährlich) a hundred years ago. There is nothing new under the sun; nothing is learnt or forgotten by Masons. Had not the "German Library" established by Nicolai in Berlin the self-same object in view? A similar hatred was displayed, and the same weapons were employed, in the persecutions carried on against the Catholic faith by the accursed sect of the Illuminati, established by the Freemason F. A. Weishaupt, the parent of that wretched class of individuals who, at the present day, are thrusting themselves into notice in Bavaria. It is true that, later on, many Freemasons were ashamed to acknowledge such sorry comrades, but it cannot be denied that Weishaupt was a Freemason,<sup>1</sup> that his doings, far from being disowned, were approved of by the Lodge, and at the Convention of Wilhelmsbad the Illuminati were able to boast that there was not one of all the Lodges legitimately established in Germany which was not in correspondence with their Order.

It is natural that the most intense hatred should concentrate itself on the central point of Catholic unity, the Papacy. For ninety years past the Secret Society has plainly been striving to wrest the States of the Church from the dominion of the Pope. We find Vienna, were scoffed at in the most disgraceful manner by the organs of Freemasonry—e.g., the "Realzeitung," and Vienna "Freimaureurjournal." The Pope himself fared no better during his residence in the Austrian capital. V. Brunner, "Mysterien," p. 199, also his "Theolog. Dienerschaft," p. 423, and other lampoons of the time. Besides the above-named Born and Ratschky, Reinhold, Haschka, and the notorious Blumauer were amongst the active Masons. Brunner tells us that in 1783 there were already forty volumes of Masonic songs, many of them printed with music, which were sung at the Masonic religious services.

Nor its fawning slaves with their Jesuit smile,
Wearing piety’s cloak, but assassins at heart,
Deter you from acting so noble a part.”

Another wearer of the leather apron writes thus :—“What should we do if our Emperor were to be excommunicated ? Why laugh, laugh with all our might ! O Joseph, great immortal Joseph ! The nations of the future, whose emancipation thou alone wast capable of effecting, will thank thee in years to come, will pay to thy ashes the tribute of copious tears, like clouds of incense ; and no true-hearted German will pass thy tomb without arresting his steps, and thinking with a sigh : Here lies Joseph, the greatest Emperor ever known.”—Brunner, p. 220. In proof that the hatred of the Lodges to the Papacy has, if possible, increased in our own day, we transcribe in the original the following verses, sung at a Masonic banquet in Belgium.

L’EXCOMMUNICATION.

A ce Banquet où l’amitié préside,
J’avais dessein d’apporter ma gaité ;
Hélas ! la peur me rend la voix timide
Du Vatican les foudres m’ont heurté.
Un jour l’Enfer décuplera sa dime
Sur les maçons que je vois assemblés.
Frères pour vous, ah ! ma pitié s’anime,
Vous êtes tous des excommuniés.

Vous méprisez une idole pourrie,
Devant laquelle un peuple est à genoux ;
Il existait dans son temple b’ottie,
Une Hydre obscène ayant les yeux sur vous.
Le vieux serpent aujourd’hui se ranime,
Son noir venin vous a tous effleurés.
Frères pour vous, ah ! ma pitié s’anime,
Vous êtes tous des excommuniés.

Quoi vous riez du courroux du St-Père
Et vous raillez du nouveau mandement,
Tout comme si, pour son épouse altière,
Dieu dût faillir au dernier jugement.

Que de dévots auraient un pied de nez.
Frères pour vous, ah ! ma pitié s’anime,
Vous êtes tous des excommuniés.

Vous reveillant d’une terre maudite,
Que direz-vous au portier des Elus ?
Quand près de Dieu la vertu seule acquitte, Au goupillon St-Pierre tient bien plus.
La bienfaisance à ses yeux vous est crime,
En vain il voit les pauvres soulagés.
Frères pour vous, ah ! ma pitié s’anime,
Vous êtes tous des excommuniés.

Mai je me tais, j’entends votre murmure
Qui vient me dire : Irions-nous au taudis
Où Borgia promène sa souillure ?
Pape infaillible il est en Paradis.
A libre choix, nous préférons l’abyme
Ou De Voltaire est au rang des damnés.
Point n’est besoin que ta pitié s’anime,
Nous voulons tous être excommuniés.

reign of the same monarch making merry beforehand over the excommunication which their "immortal Joseph" would incur in the event of his following their advice. When the Grand Master of the Grand Orientals of France, Prince Murat, voted in the Senate for the temporal power of the Holy Father, such a storm was aroused by the heretical boldness displayed in this anti-Masonic action, that he was forced to resign his post in favour of Marshal Magnan. ("Laacher Stimmen," February 1872, p. 118, &c.) The sacrilegious act perpetrated on September 20, 1870, as well as the whole success of revolutionary principles in the South, is to be attributed to Freemasonry, this triumph having been promised to it five and a half years before, as a reward for services rendered elsewhere. The remarkable lethargy displayed by European diplomatic circles on the occasion referred to may be traced to the same source.

IV. Heresies and schisms are no unimportant auxiliaries in carrying on war with the Church of Christ; therefore Freemasonry fosters and promotes every heretical rising within the realm of Catholic Christendom. By it the Jansenists and Febronians of former days were petted and caressed; the Josephinian excitement was for the most part the work, long prepared, of the Austrian Brothers of Beelzebub; and the same may be said in the case of the heresies disseminated on German soil by fallen spirits during the last few years. The tremendous outcry invariably accompanying their miserable attempts, calculated, if possible, to deceive the very elect, must be traced to the same dark agencies. Let us hear the testimony of two witnesses.

Jochmus-Müller, President of the German-Catholic Community in Berlin, writes thus in his "Kirchenreform" (vol. iii. p. 230): "Every one is aware that Freemasonry has exerted a favourable influence on the development of German Catholicism, which has contributed so many valiant recruits to its ranks, and that no attempt is made by either side at concealing the perfect concord existing between them on religious matters. Together with this admission, we must express our firm conviction that these common principles form the religion of the future, which, in spite of excommunication and compulsion, of skill and cunning, will soon be believed explicitly, as they already are implicitly, by the majority of educated people."

Giese, a member of the Lodge of Halle, and pastor of the German-Catholic, called later the Free, Church of that place, declares in the Berlin "Allgemeine Kirchenzeitung" (1847)—"The doctrines of the Free Church are a sort of popularised Freemasonry. Moreover, all Civic Unions, Trade Unions, Polytechnic Societies, Sunday Schools, Musical Clubs, &c., pursue the same end, and only apply the great principle of Freemasonry, of which they are Associates and Sister-societies, in a somewhat different manner and form." If we cannot interpret these words in their fullest meaning, they are, at any rate, more than sufficient to prove our assertion.

And now look at the apostates of later days. How tender is the friendship that binds them to the heroes of the trowel and plumb-line! They have even taken the pains to learn Masonic slang, and are as proud of this accomplishment as a negro can be of the glass-beads for which he has just bartered true gold. They are rewarded by being received as Brothers, and having fresh life communicated to them. We will give one example of the mutual similarity in thought and speech of the different Lodges. On the occasion of the dedication of Lodge "Mataram" in Djokdjokarta, the speaker thus expressed himself:—
"Freemasonry aims at the amelioration of the human race, the development of man as a rational being, capable of thought, will, and action, and the advancement of society on the path of culture, science, learning, morality, sociability, and philanthropy" ("Jaarboekje," &c., p. 159). Are not the sounds re-echoed from Dutch Java identical with those heard in the petty congresses of modern Protestants, and the sapient utterances of their Patriarch?

In times when storms rage high against the Catholic Church, the Secret Union gains immensely in the number of its members, in its power over fashionable society, and in its influence in ruling circles.<sup>1</sup>

The ill-will which would lead it to wage war to the knife with the Church is never wanting. It has ever at hand an innumerable array of confederates, composed of craven souls who lack the courage to stand up for Christ; of worldly-minded persons, who esteem gold of greater value than virtue; of liberal Catholics, who, in the heat of the strife, would make peace on dishonourable terms; of all those professing Christians outside the Church's pale, who, in the dim twilight of their false creed, bore holes in the bottom of the great ship on which their own little bark is carried. It were culpable negligence in us Catholics to under-estimate our enemy because he works in silence, and to speak slightly of him even in the present day, when the successes he achieves are trumpeted abroad. The Popes have judged very differently of the Secret Society. Clement XII., as early as 18th April 1738, issued a bull threatening all secret sects with the severest penalties of the Church, especially that of the Freemasons. The menace was confirmed and renewed by Benedict XIV. in a fresh bull, March 18, 1751. Pius VII. raised his voice against the Carbonari, one of the Masonic Parties of Action, in his bull of September 13, 1821. Leo XII. also denounced Freemasons in a bull of March 13, 1826. Gregory XVI., too, in his Encyclical (August 15, 1832), enlightened the Christian world in regard to the danger that awaited it; and Pius IX. has repeatedly done the same.<sup>1</sup> Obedient to the warning cry uttered by their Chief Shepherd in 1837, the Belgian bishops collectively declared all Freemasons to be excommunicated. The more the secular power acts as if it were deaf to the sounds of these sappers and miners, the louder must all Catholics raise their voice; and they must no longer refuse to see more than a convivial and bacchanalian club in a society spoken of by the Popes as seriously endangering the salvation of souls and the work of the Church. Did not the Freemason whom we have already so often quoted, himself acknowledge in the German Quarterly Magazine—“In justice to the Roman hierarchy, it must be said that they recognised the true aim and wide scope of the Society, as well as its great importance, not only more clearly, but at an earlier date, than did many of its members themselves, and they held to their opinions with greater tenacity.”

Thus the days have now come of which the first Pope wrote these words:—“There were also false prophets among the (Jewish) people, even as there shall be among you lying teachers, who shall bring in sects of perdition, and deny the Lord who bought them, bringing on themselves swift destruction; and many shall follow their luxuries, through whom the way of truth shall be evil-spoken of; and through covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you " (2 Peter ii. 1-3).

The public action of the Church is already much hampered, if not altogether checked, all over Europe, but the work is as yet incomplete; ere long she will be completely thrust back into the Catacombs, there, like a criminal, to call her children together in secret, while the birds of night greet the grey, dim light—so uncongenial to man—and rejoice in it as in the glorious brightness of noonday splendour. Maxentius and Constantine the Great once more stand opposed to one another, and victory is once more reserved for him who obeys the heavenly voice: In hoc signo vinces.

CHAPTER IV.

THE COVERT WARFARE WAGED BY THE SECRET SOCIETY AGAINST CHRISTIANITY.

FREEMASONRY can always reckon on the co-operation of Protestantism when attacking institutions exclusively Catholic. As a rule, in carrying out its plans for the remodelling of the world, it can find employment for workmen of every kind, from the liberal Catholic to the avowed atheist. There are, however, different grades in the service. In order to remove the possibility of any divisions arising in the ranks of its employés, and, at the same time, to ensure the Secret Society appearing to outsiders to be a harmless association of philanthropists, those rules which are made public contain a special proviso that the discussion of religious questions shall be banished from the meetings of the Brethren. Outpourings of hatred to the Catholic hierarchy, to the doctrinal authority of the Pope and the Religious Orders—above all, the Society of Jesus—naturally come under the head of purely secular and everyday topics.

But the prohibition of all religious discussions in a circle of friends strikes one as peculiar, to say the least of it. We can understand the necessity of prudential measures of a similar nature in meetings of persons holding widely different religious views, or in associations having for their object the promotion of the temporal welfare alone of the community ; but it is incomprehensible in the case of Freemasons, who openly boast that they aim at nothing short of perfect unanimity amongst themselves on all most important questions. Take one example in proof of this. The ritual for the admission of a Scotch Ancient or Grand Master in the Chief Patriotic Lodge of Germany runs as follows :—“ Friendship is the sacred bond which unites together all the Brethren of our Craft ; for, however much scattered over the face of the earth, they all compose one only body ; because one is their origin and one their aim, one the mystery into which they are initiated, one the path by which they are led, one the gauge and measure applied to each and all of them, and one the spirit by which they are animated ” (Eckert, “ Die Frage der Staatl. Anerk.,” p. 12).

According to this, we can come to no other conclusion than that there exists a secret union, which, while taking the field in the most decided manner against every positive religion, and singling out the Christian religion as its chief foe, refuses, in the ordinary intercourse of its members, to allow a word to be heard about religion. But lest it be thought that we are indulging in a merely malicious suspicion when using such language, we will cite the official utterances of the Society. The Freemasons’ Journal of

Vienna (2d series, No. 2, p. 143) thus reports the speech of a Master, addressing his Brethren from the chair of office :—“ What is the false religion so eagerly forced upon mankind in mosques, synagogues, temples, and churches, except a jugglery carried on by imaums, popes, and priests? And are we to hold our tongues about it all, until defective education, long habits of slavery, superstitious prejudices, unreasoning endurance, shall at length have deprived men even of the power to see the real state of affairs? ”

We are now in a position to assert that Freemasonry is the sworn enemy of Christianity in general. We know well how heavy is this charge which we bring against it, and we are bound in common justice to prove all we say from the documents of the Lodges. If we are able to make good our cause (and we have little doubt of accomplishing this), every Christian, without distinction of creeds, will feel it incumbent on him to take up arms against the common foe, and Freemasonry will no longer be able either secretly or openly to administer its soothing narcotic, and persuade men that it strives only to overthrow Ultramontaniam, Jesuitism, and the Papacy. In such a case, all Christians must make common cause. Were the Lodge ever to propose, even to the most zealous Jesuit, to completely exterminate Protestantism, the answer returned would surely be this—“ The boon you offer is an insidious and treacherous one. I will not accept it at your hand. As far as lies in me, never shall you lay a finger upon Protestantism ; for you hate it, not because it has fallen away from the one true Church, but because you cannot tolerate those portions of Christian truth which still cling to it."

We can here, of course, only touch upon such points as have been common to Christendom in all times and in all places, concerning which, consequently, all denominations are at one, and we must prove Freemasonry to be antagonistic to them all. Now all bodies of professing Christians must assent to the four following propositions :—

1. The Christian religion is holy ; therefore its external forms are to be respected, and the social life of all nations professing Christianity must be regulated according to its maxims.

2. The Bible is sacred, and a fountain-head of truth.

3. Christ is truly God, and the Son of God.

4. The maintenance and spread of Christ's kingdom is to be desired.

The work before us divides itself naturally into these four heads :—

I. The attitude of Freemasonry in regard to the externals of Christianity.

Now, in places where it is expedient to keep up an outward appearance of Christianity, Freemasonry not only allows, but desires, its members to conform to the religious usages of the country in which they may chance to be residing. It was for the interests of the Society in general, not merely for his own private interests, that Brother Verhaegen, whose sad end created such a stir in Brussels, should have the reputation amongst the people of being the ablest man in the country, and the king's most trusty counsellor; on this account he might be seen every Sunday and holiday ostentatiously wending his way to High Mass, with a prayer-book conspicuous under his arm. Similar sights may now be seen in Belgium in the very towns where Freemasonry is known to have a large number of adherents. Prudential motives have likewise actuated the National Parent Lodge of the Three Globes in Berlin to deny admission for many years past to any but Christians; though since 1868 it has seen fit to receive unbelievers as associate brothers.<sup>1</sup> As yet, Jews must, for form's sake, make good their reception in Leipzig or Hamburg, if they would be fellow-workers with the Lodge in Berlin.<sup>2</sup> On the other hand, no opposition is offered if a newly-admitted brother feels called upon to fulfil his religious duties, for although he has not yet been initiated into the higher degrees, he can still be of service in his own place, if only by his opposition to that religious fervour which Freemasonry so cordially detests. We can safely take for granted that during all those centuries when Governments were Christian, the work went on secretly, but all the more surely, although the externals of Christianity were not openly attacked. The mole burrows best far away from the regimental band.

The modern English "Book of Constitutions" speaks still more plainly (Eckert, p. 25):—"In olden times, Masons calling themselves Christians were, into whatever land they might be led by business or pleasure, bound to conform to the Christian usages of the country; but now a Mason, in his character of a true Noachite, is bound to observe only the moral law."<sup>1</sup>

Now, what is to be understood by these laws of Noah? The modern English "Book of Constitutions" says—"As a true Noachite, the Mason is solemnly pledged to keep the moral law, and to fulfil the precepts of that religion in which all men agree; for to the three great maxims of Noah no one can refuse assent." The York "Record" and the above-named "Book of Constitutions" give us three antediluvian and three postdiluvian commands of God to Noah. Those given subsequent to the Flood, founded on Genesis ix. 1, &c., are thus embodied:—

I. "The world is given to man that he may enjoy it." A maxim which the epicurean well knows how to appreciate.

<sup>1</sup> From the writings of the Craft we gather that the Noah of whom they speak is a very different being to the Patriarch of Scripture. As looked upon from a naturalistic point of view, he has more analogy to the Bacchus of the Greeks or the Osiris of the Egyptians. (Cf. Eckert, "Die Frage der Staatl. Anerk.," p. 34, &c.)

2. "Man is bound to abstain from shedding blood ;" and, also—

3. "From eating flesh with blood."

But the special, the "great" Noachian laws are those given before the Flood, viz.—

1. "To build the Ark" (that is, to help in constructing our Ark, the Craft, a structure destined for the whole world).

2. "In it to abide the chastisement about to come on the world" (that is, remain true to our Craft while the state of things around us is involved in destruction).

3. "To re-populate the earth after the Flood" (that is, find the highest bliss in sensual enjoyment).

The Modern English "Book of Constitutions" further explains—"As the destruction of the world drew near, God commanded Noah to build the Ark, or floating fortress, in which work his three sons assisted him, one as Deputy-Master, the other two as Master Masons. Although the material employed in its construction was but wood, the Ark was as geometrically correct as if made of stone, and when complete, formed a splendid masterpiece of architecture. This wonderful edifice was 300 cubits long, 50 wide, and 30 high ; it was of cedar-wood, and was divided into four stories, in each of which there were chambers, separated by partitions. Thus the whole present race of mankind derived its origin from these four Freemasons, or Grand Functionaries. . . . After the Flood Noah and his three sons preserved the knowledge of the arts and sciences, transmitting them to their descendants. They dwelt together in the Land of Sennaar, as Noachites; such being, according to some old chronicles, the name originally borne by Freemasons."

What most forcibly strikes us here is the supercilious manner in which the whole system of Christianity and the Mosaic revelation are ignored, the latter being put out of the question from motives of prudence. The statement of the greatest importance, and which gives a key to the whole mystery, is this, that the Mason, as a true Noachite, is solemnly pledged to keep the moral law, and to fulfil the precepts of that religion in which all men agree, and which consists precisely of the three laws of Noah. No mention is made of dogmatic faith, just as if it did not exist; the whole religion of the Freemason consisting in the moral law; and even this is condensed into the three notorious articles, which neither Rationalist nor Buddhist would feel the least hesitation in signing. But as since the time of Noah the dogmas of faith and the laws of morality have been revealed by God for our guidance, first by the mouth of Moses, and afterwards by that of His only-begotten Son, it is an act of rebellion against the Supreme Lawgiver to hold exclusively to the earlier injunctions, and pertinaciously ignore the later. A soldier would be as much justified in addressing his Commander-in-Chief by the title of Captain, because he formerly held that rank in the army, as one is in speaking of the Noachian precepts as the true religion, now that the light of Christianity shines upon the world. Those, nevertheless, who act thus, afford incontrovertible proof that they repudiate the whole system of Christianity, regarding it as a nursery tale for the amusement of the populace. Such a degradation of all that is most sacred can be looked upon with indifference by no body of Christians; this is a gauntlet which no one on whose head the waters of baptism have been poured can refuse to take up.

We see, moreover, that in the Masonic view man is regarded exclusively in the condition in which he was at the time Noah left the Ark, namely, in his purely natural condition of a rational biped. He who requires man to be more than this, sins against the one true faith, the three laws of Noah; consequently the social life of mankind cannot be expected to be more than merely natural. All that is supernatural must therefore be carefully eradicated from the soil of the State and of society, or at most tolerated there for the present, just for the sake of those troglodytes who call themselves Christians. Thus, the Christian State, denominational education, Christian marriage, in a word, the whole influence exercised by Christianity upon daily life, becomes an insupportable tyranny, practised by benighted birds of prey on the majestic and keen-sighted eagle; and man must put forth all the powers of his mind to free social life from such debasing fetters, giving himself no rest until he sees a godless State, secular compulsory education, civil marriage, and other things of a like kind, become inviolable articles of the constitution.

It is from such a standpoint as this that the political phenomena of our own day must be viewed. In point of fact, it is not the Liberals who agitate vehemently for a radical reversion to a state of things existing five thousand years ago; the majority of them entertain ideas differing toto cælo from these. It is from the Masonic Lodges that the whole impetus comes of a movement which almost succeeds in carrying us along with it, for we know that, come what may, this consoling fact ever remains, Christianity is certain to outlive the storm. The dilatoriness displayed by the good, and the cowardice of the half-hearted, have brought Christendom under the yoke of Freemasonry, and Christianity will soon be afraid to show itself openly. Let us proceed to bring forward proofs of this.

Brother Gotthold Salomon, D.Ph., preacher at the new Synagogue at Hamburg, member of the Lodge entitled "The Dawn in the East," in Frankfort-on-Main, thus writes in his "Stimmen aus Osten" MSS. for the Brethren:—"Why is there not a trace of anything appertaining to the Christian Church to be found in the whole ritual of Freemasonry? Why is not the name of Jesus once mentioned, either in the oath administered, or in the prayers on the opening of the Lodges, or at the Masonic banquets? Why do Masons reckon time, not from the birth of Christ, but from the creation of the world, as do the Jews? <sup>1</sup> Why does not Freemasonry make use of a single Christian symbol? Why have we the compasses, the triangle, the hydrometer, instead of the cross and other emblems of the Passion? Why have Wisdom, Beauty, and Strength superseded the Christian triad of Faith, Hope, and Charity? ”

In what light, then, does a member of the Craft look upon Christianity? He looks upon it as he looks upon the Christian State—namely, as a chain forged by deceit and imposed by force, which it is the business of his life to break and demolish. In the “Latomia,” vol. ii. p. 176, we are told that the memorial entitled “Banquet on Occasion of the 25th Jubilee of the ‘Aurora’ Lodge in Frankfort-on-Main,” was printed for circulation amongst a portion of the Fraternity. This contained, besides other essays, one called “The Spirit of Freemasonry,” by a Jewish member of the literary world, Dr Herz, from which we give the following extracts:—“To call Masonic Lodges Christian institutions is to overlook the essential mission of the Craft, which is to fill up the chasms cleft by differences of religious opinion and of social grades in the fabric of humanity. If Freemasonry ceases to keep this its vocation steadily in view, it will only serve to strengthen prejudice and error. It is true that now one stone after another is being thrown down from the thick wall, cemented by darkness, constructed of hallowed impostures and false maxims, of myths and legends, of sham traditions and sacred symbols, that was raised in order to exclude the light of reason, and to screen with zealous care blind credulity and its natural offspring, blind obedience. And that no man might dare to lay hands on the fabric of their deceit and tyrannical power, and undermine its buttresses, they entered into a covenant with the secular power, and wove the scheme of a State religion, thus attaching temporal advantages to an external profession of religion, introducing into society a legalised deception, and encouraging such deception by promising to reward it. . . . But men had access to the treatises of antiquity ; they could peruse the revelations made to the master-spirits of Greece and Rome, and of the little country of Judæa,—and very different were the doctrines found inscribed in those pages from those which priests, monks, and rabbis have taught. Hence one Samson after another has arisen to shake with no feeble hand the pillars which support the ancient structure ; already they have begun to fall, and through the crevices thus formed the noonday brightness was poured in—‘and there was light!’ . . . And it was in the halls of the Craft that, under cover of the mystery which enveloped them, noble minds of every class and every rank first called into activity, and commu-

No ; Freemasonry does not regard the Bible as a sacred volume, but as a mere ritualistic accessory, entirely without any internal value of its own. "Brother" K. Chr. Fr. Krause—who, for having divulged the secrets of the Craft, was expelled from the Fraternity in 1810, and persecuted by his former Brethren until his death—speaks thus, "However Masons may formerly have regarded the Bible, they now, at all events, know how to put it in its proper place. The Mason should be entirely free from all blind adherence to any dogmatic belief whatsoever, just as Jesus appears to have been." In other words, Masons consider the Bible as an interesting book, but see nothing sacred about it to make them believe in it. From an address delivered by Marbach, the chairman of the Leipzig Lodge (2d ed. "Leipzig," 1862), we gather that he had been blamed for having quoted the Bible too frequently, this being at variance with the first principles of Freemasonry, which does not view the Bible, as the Church does, as a text-book of religion, but as a symbol of faith and religious persuasion. Thus the religion of the true Mason differs entirely from the religion of the Bible, and the Bible itself is not looked upon as a sacred and divinely-inspired volume. Marbach completely admits these principles, and thus answers the objection raised, "But, my Brethren, the question may arise in the minds of some amongst you ; if we are always being referred to the Bible as the rule and guide of our faith, what becomes of the proud boast of Freemasonry, that it heeds no differences of creed, and gives the title of Brother alike to Christian and Jew, to heathen and Mohammedan, in a word, to every one who bears the name of man? O my Brethren! will you be put to shame by your Mohammedan Brethren, who are willing to see your Bible upon the altar instead of their Koran? I tell you, Were a heathen or a Mussulman to come forward, and take exception at hearing these walls resound with the words of Scripture, employed in order that we may adore God in spirit and in truth, I should pronounce him to be no true Freemason, even could he boast a tenfold acquaintance with sign, password, and grip. And I tell you once again, Were a Christian to stand forth in this assembly, and take you to task for quoting words from the Koran, from Sophocles, or from Goethe, used to enable us to adore God in a universal spirit and in truth, he would no better deserve the name of Freemason, since all writings inspired by God are profitable to teach, to reprove, to correct, to instruct in justice. Where the Spirit of God is, there is the Bible."<sup>1</sup> Strip these words of their rhetorical bombast, and they will be found to mean that the Bible is worth as much to the German Mason as to the heathen Mussulman, i.e., absolutely nothing, and is to be ranked with the Koran, with Sophocles, and with Goethe, as an intellectual storehouse of quotations, a purely human production.

We find that from the so-called altars of many of their "temples" the members of the Craft have been honest enough to remove the Bible; they are also beginning to employ their pen to procure its final banishment from them.

Respecting "The Bible in the Lodge," an article appears in the "Jaarboekje," i.e., in the official Dutch Freemasons' Almanack for 1872, by Brother C. Van Schaick, from which we take the following extracts:—"As matters now stand, the presence of the Bible on our altar is an empty form. . . . From whatever point of view we regard the Bible, we do not hesitate to declare openly, that in our reunions it is out of place, once and for ever, since the doctrines of humanity now occupy the most prominent position, and are taught as the best method of ameliorating the condition of mankind." We must do the man the justice to add, that he stands up boldly to protest against hypocritical disguises, that he will "have nothing to do with misleading any one, oppressing any one, or depriving any one of liberty of conscience." But the question must present itself to every man who attaches any value to the name of Christian, whether he can now take one single step in union with an association which altogether repudiates the divine origin of Holy Writ, and sees in it nothing but an accessory to its ceremonial? Human intelligence, not divine revelation, is their rallying-cry, and the attack is now directed against the last outpost of Christianity.

III. The attitude of Freemasonry in regard to the divinity of Christ.

As the Secret Society ignores the whole body of Christian dogma, and only understands by religion some general principles of morality prescribed by reason, in which all mankind will agree, it is easy to understand that from the very outset it has been antagonistic to the divinity of Christ. In fact, how can he who denies the sacred character of the Bible retain for a single moment this, the fundamental dogma of all Christian societies which agree in accepting the two oldest creeds? And if it can be proved that Freemasonry is an institution of the Synagogue (a point upon which we will not now enter), and dates from the time when, after her heroic sacrifices were accomplished, Christianity became triumphant, it would follow as a matter of course that the point against which the Society directs its fiercest attack should be the doctrine of the Divinity of our Lord. And if, indeed, all Christian belief is to be banished from the world, and "the interest which men can so easily be made to feel in dogma and symbolism" is to be diverted by means of a mysterious cultus from the channel of dogmatism into that of morality,<sup>1</sup> and Christian charity is to be replaced by certain social forms,—then we consider ourselves entirely justified in asserting that Freemasonry denies the divinity of Christ. This denial

Frederick, Prince of Orange, the second son of William I., King of the Netherlands, was chosen on the 4th June 1816 (when he had scarcely attained his nineteenth year) as National Grand Master for life of the Grand Lodge of the Hague. The next year he was also elected in the Grand Orient, in Brussels, to the Grand Mastership of the Southern, now called the Belgic, Lodges. Although he had only been made acquainted with the fantastic Jewish legends of the Craft, his upright mind, thoroughly imbued as it was with Christian sentiments, suspected the rabbinical hatred lurking behind them, and led him to resign the post of honour he occupied. We will give some passages from the reasons for this step, which were sent by him to the head of the Lodge. In them he thus speaks of the fourth higher grade, that of Rosicrucian (Souverain Prince Rose-Croix):—"I am a Christian, and will ever remain one. Everybody will understand how extremely painful it is for me to be compelled to speak of the abuse made in the Masonic legend of the teaching of my Divine Master, the Son of the Heavenly Father, who, having assumed a human form, became at the same time the Head of the human race, and in this character gives to mankind those holy laws which first teach us men our true dignity; who willingly endured the dreadful death of the Cross, and could say with justice of His work, 'It is consummated!' How could I write the story of Thy life, O divine Jesus, and then call this story the Legend of the Degree of Rosicrucian? Those who know no better perhaps might exclaim, What more could be claimed for any legend? But right reason and profound reverence bid my pen stop here. Is it possible to degrade this hallowed story so low as to turn it into a mere legend? And can any one fail to perceive that in such a case it would become a simple parable, like the fable of Zorobabel, fit to be ranked in the same class with it, and that the death of Jesus Christ would in like manner be reduced to the same level as that of Adoniram? But where is the real Christian who could find it possible to doubt the history of our Lord as contained in the New Testament? Where is the Jew who will venture to deny the Crucifixion? It is a fact which even a Mohammedan does not call in question. And can it be that the Brethren of the Craft meanwhile regard this death as a parable, and range it with the mass of fictions which are successively set before them? Let us not deceive ourselves, my Brethren, and dissemble the fact, that the Legend of the Grade of a 'Sovereign Prince Rosicrucian' is no other than the history of Jesus Christ! Enough has been said on this point, perhaps too much; for who will pretend that it is not utterly unjustifiable to place the life and death of Jesus Christ side by side with fables? And we further find, to our indignation, ceremonies in connection with the reading of the legend of this grade which are in direct opposition to the teaching and character of the Son of God, and to His holy law. For instance, an axe is swung above the head of the candidate at the moment he pronounces his oath. Now, the words of Jesus breathe gentle persuasion; while the Rosicrucian, on the contrary, employs emblems denoting power, force, and violence." Lest we should weary the reader, we are compelled reluctantly to break off the words of the young Prince, the purity and simplicity of whose mind enabled him to see through the disguises in which hatred of Christ had clothed itself. In opposition to the false pretences of Freemasonry, the Prince proceeds to prove that the grade of Rosicrucian cannot be accepted by persons belonging to any religious persuasion, since it is accompanied by a ceremonial equally repugnant to the Jew, the Turk, and the Christian. We quote his own words:—"Ask the Jew if he can become a Rosicrucian, and he will reply, 'How can you require me conscientiously to pay homage to Jesus? Our histories and traditions teach us that he was a deceiver, who pursued his own selfish ends, and sought to raise himself to the highest rank amongst men. You yourselves intimate as much, by giving him the name of J. N. R. J., and designating him in your ritual by this appellation.' What would the answer of the Mohammedan be? Almost identical with that of the Jew." "Why," continues the Prince, "should I allow others to force from me a promise to veil the teaching of my Divine Master from the eyes of my fellow-men? Did He not bid us 'Go and teach all nations'? Of what use, then, is this symbolic dressing-up of the Sovereign Prince Rosicrucian? We have in the New Testament the life and death of Jesus Christ, and, above all, His teaching, set before us in such plain terms that they need no further explanation. What do I want with all your symbols, some of which are, to say the least, objectionable?" Somewhat further on the Prince excuses himself for his non-observance of the secrecy prescribed by the Craft in regard to this portion of its teaching; for if the doctrines heard in the Lodge are the doctrines of Jesus Christ, he may and must proclaim them openly; if not, he has no right to accept them. "You say, for instance," he writes, "that the name of your Chief Master, i.e., Jesus Christ, is Jesus Nazarenus Rex Judæorum. No, my Brethren, you deceive yourselves; it is not so. Jesus Himself testifies, 'My kingdom is not of this world;' and if these words are not enough for you, you know full well that the actions of the lowly Jesus prove Him to have sought not His own interests, but those of humanity."<sup>1</sup> The ex-Grand Master was not far wrong. In so far as the Divine Redeemer appears in the said Masonic ritual, He is nothing more than a selfish seditious, who was overtaken by justice at the very moment He was about to seize the crown. The battle-cry of this anti-Christian militia, in the sacrilegious warfare which it wages with God and His Anointed, is in complete harmony with the delusion which has possessed the blind Jewish nation ever since the first Good Friday.

But more unequivocal expressions on the part of Freemasonry are not wanting. Later on we shall bring forward a French document, which breathes the Pantheistic spirit of Spinoza in its teaching about God, of whom it asserts that His existence is coeval with that of matter, and that He cannot be divided into a plurality of persons, nor be made subject to human infirmities; consequently neither has died, nor can die. Furthermore, it is boldly alleged, in the name of the Craft, that it was impossible for Christ to have been God, or, indeed, anything more than a being of superior intelligence—a philosopher or a sage. If Freemasonry were really in earnest, as it professes to be, in its determination to exclude all religious discussions from its gatherings, and if it did not fully agree, even in its higher grades, with the opinion here expressed of Christ, it must necessarily have risen as one man to repudiate such an assertion. But this it did not do, and, what is more, this it could not do. It was not until 1865 that the "Grand Orient" of Paris, considering the excited state of public opinion, thought fit to declare, after passing its statutes in review, that it recognised the existence of a God and the immortality of the soul.<sup>1</sup>

The same phenomena are to be met with in Germany. Brother Jochmus-Müller, President of the late German-Catholic Church at Berlin, says in his "Kirchenreform" (vol. iii. p. 228)—"We have more in common with a free-thinking, honest Paganism, than with a narrow-minded Christianity." By this he means a Christianity which still believes in the divinity of its Founder.

A kindred soul (Bastide) says much the same thing in the Universal Church Times of Berlin (Eckert, p. 51), addressing the editor:—"It cannot be new to you that the Mother of the Saviour has taken the place of Isis and Alcmene; that the festival of the Saviour's birth has superseded the joyous saturnalia attending the middle of the winter solstice; that the mysteries of Holy Week and Easter have replaced those of the death and resurrection of Adonis, when the awakening of Nature at the time of the vernal equinox was also celebrated." Thus Christ becomes a mere mythical personage, like Hercules, Adonis, or Osiris, or whoever may be chosen to personify the sun in his annual course.

It is plainly apparent that doctrines such as these are fraught with much danger to the beliefs of Protestantism. On account of this, the Protestant Consistory in Hanover was only acting in self-defence when, in the year 1745, it decreed that any preacher who was already a Freemason should receive a strict injunction, with which he should be compelled to comply, immediately to resign his membership, and abandon all practices connected with it; and that in future the clergy should be forbidden, under strict penalties, to join the Craft, since for them, above all other men, it was most unjustifiable to become members of a society which denied them the right of making themselves acquainted with its laws and regulations previous to binding themselves to it in the most solemn manner. And this prohibition was to hold good even if it were alleged that the chief object of the society was to unite Christians in a bond of charity; for in Holy Scripture they have so strong a bond that they can need no other. "Nevertheless Freemasonry, as the Protestant ecclesiastical historian Guerike deplores, has exercised unbounded influence on the destinies of positive Christianity; has sought, as far as possible, to strike it with its hammer, and shatter it into a thousand fragments; has endeavoured, finally, to construct a new system of worship in the place of that established by Christ. . . . In order to attain this end, it has employed those principles of brotherly love, mutual help, and fidelity on which the Society rests, to effect a widespread system of corruption, and obtain a monopoly of all posts and offices capable of influencing Christianity, science, or the Church."<sup>1</sup>

In order, under cover of the spread of so-called science, to render the denial of Christ's divinity more and more universal, the German Protestant Association was founded by men known to be leaders of Freemasonry, on principles in striking harmony with the religious views of the Craft; in fact, its very language recalls strongly the jargon of the Lodges. Christian feeling does occasionally rise up against the preachers of this party when they give too great publicity to their heterodox opinions; but the day is now past when faith was upheld by authority, and when Freemasonry was a thing tolerated, indeed, but forced to keep out of sight. Now, on the contrary, it boasts openly of an influence never greater than at present. The old Lutheran Congress at Kammin showed a just appreciation of the position of affairs when it enacted that its clergy should be forbidden to join either the body of Freemasons or the Protestant Association.

The proceedings of the Secret International Congress of Freemasons, held during the first three days of November 1872, evinced a similar desire to exterminate the belief in the divinity of Christ by means of democratic revolution, and to give the force of constitutional law to the opinions of Freemasonry as to what ought to be called religion. The Congress met at a villa near Lucarno, and sat each day from 4 P.M. until midnight. One of the subjects deliberated upon was the nature of the worship to be introduced. It was unanimously agreed to throw into a catechetical shape the democratic Bible of the Socinian Renan, and to make this the handbook of the religion to be publicly recognised in the social and democratic republic of the future.<sup>1</sup>

We leave all those Christians who are separated from the Church to decide for themselves whether the designs of Freemasonry are directed against the Church of Rome alone.

IV. The attitude of Freemasonry in respect to the maintenance of Christianity.

Even at the time when the Archangel Gabriel announced to the most Blessed Virgin the incarnation of the Son of God, he wound up with these words—"And of His kingdom there shall be no end" (Luke i. 33). The fathers assembled at Nicæa took up the strain with the joyous confidence of undoubting faith, and closed the Christological portion of their creed with the same words—

<sup>1</sup> This Congress, in which the preliminaries were arranged of the transactions enacted in Rome on November 24, 1872, was attended by the chiefs of the Freemasonic party of action, the secret of its proceedings being divulged in several letters published in the Univers, particularly in the numbers of the 12th and 19th November 1872. The Congress was attended by delegates from the Grand Lodges of Palermo, Naples, Rome, Florence, Turin, and Genoa; also from those of France, Hungary, Germany, and Switzerland.

Cujus regni non erit finis. All bodies of Christians earnestly desire the maintenance of the religion of Jesus Christ, and do their utmost to spread it, while their united supplication ascends to heaven—"Thy kingdom come." On this point we once more discover Freemasonry to be the very antipodes of Christianity.

Freemasonry is, by its own confession, the representative of Paganism, and is about to renew once more the struggle with Christianity, which must be for life and death.

Le Globe,<sup>1</sup> a Masonic journal, issued from 1839-1843 by L. Th. Juge, one who had himself been initiated into the highest grades of Freemasonry, has been pronounced by those invested with highest authority in the Craft to be the truest exponent of its secret teaching. In this journal an account is given of a speech delivered in the Lodge of the Knights of Malta by "Brother" de Branville (ex-officier du Grand Orient de France), the principal points being as follows:—

1. The religious tenets of Freemasonry are only a continuation of the Egyptian doctrines transmitted to successive generations by the priests of the temple of Isis.

<sup>1</sup> On the title-page of Le Globe we have a long list of the Masonic titles and dignities of the editor, Juge. He himself tells us (Le Globe, ii. 53, December 1839) that the principles of his journal were formally approved by the French and foreign Lodges, and Le Globe was authorised as the official journal of Freemasonry in France. This paper is also spoken of in the highest terms elsewhere. (Cf. "Le danger de croire facilement aux prophéties," Berlin, 1872, p. 67, &c.)

2. Freemasonry received these tenets from the Knights-Templars, who, in order to escape persecution, assumed as a disguise the leather apron of the Craft.

3. The history of the Templars and the tragic end of Jacques Molay is embodied by the Masons in the twofold allegory of the Temple of Solomon and the story of Hiram; on this account secrecy is most strictly enjoined.

4. It is an authenticated fact, that from Egypt come the religious rites secretly practised by the Templars, Grand Masters, and a certain number of the most fully initiated; and that the Craft reaches back to the mysteries of the beneficent goddess Isis.<sup>1</sup>

There is no occasion for us to discuss here the guilt or innocence of the Templars, nor have we anything to do with the genealogical fables of Freemasons;<sup>2</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Barruel ("Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire du Jacobinisme," Hamburg, 1803, vol. ii. p. 277), brings forward most interesting information respecting the connection of Freemasonry with the corrupt portion of the Order of Templars, and of the latter with the Manichees, who, as is well known, appeared in the Middle Ages under various forms. Even the secret name of Masons, "Children of the Widow," points to Manes, who was adopted by the widow of a Scythian, and constituted her heir (p. 290, note).

their own admission, that the religion they profess coincides with that of the ancient Egyptians, suffices for our purpose. Now Isis was the feminine deity, representing the moon, and emblematic of the fruitfulness of the earth ; her spouse Osiris (who is veiled in the myths of the Craft under the name of Busiris,<sup>1</sup> one of the earliest kings of Egypt) being the corresponding symbol of the sun, of masculine strength, and of the fertilising Nile. Thus, from their own lips, we have the Mason's Confession of Faith : it is a modern Pagan materialism, and has a system of morality to match. Of this more will be said later on. A struggle is now imminent between this modern Paganism and Christianity ; it will be one for life and death. The facts speak for themselves, yet evidence shall be adduced from the above-named sources. An article by Brother Nash, which appeared in the English Freemasons' Quarterly Review, tracing back the origin of the Secret Society to the mysteries of Isis and Osiris, is commented on by Juge in his Globe under the following heads :—

1. Brother Nash explains most clearly how Freemasonry derives its origin from the mysteries of Isis and Osiris.

2. In a former treatise Brother de Branville proves the Order of Freemasons to be an offshoot from the Order of Templars.

<sup>1</sup> On this account the two pillars found in every Lodge are called respectively J. & B. Their Hebrew names, Jachin & Booz, as told to Apprentices, are a mere piece of ritualistic twaddle.

3. Nash demonstrates, in the work now before us, that the Templars borrowed their rules of faith and precepts of morality from the priests of Isis and Osiris.

4. "To speak in plain terms, we are, as Matter<sup>1</sup> has already observed, about to witness the last effort of ancient Paganism, which has rallied its forces for a supreme struggle with its successor" (Christianity) "before it finally abandons the field. In our opinion, it will not do to take our stand on any lower ground than this, if we would ascend to the source of those institutions which formed the materials out of which our so-called system of Freemasonry was in after-times constructed. From hence we shall have to witness a spectacle surpassing in importance anything that the human mind can conceive. We see unfolded before us not the history of institutions alone, but also that of centuries: the ancient heathenism of East and West is drawn up on one side; on the other stands Christianity; and of these combatants one must remain master of the field. We contemplate then—to borrow the words of Matter—the grandest speculative theories of Asia, Egypt, and Greece, successively attacked and overthrown by Christianity; which doctrines having risen up once more, are struggling desperately with their Conqueror, and, in order the more successfully to effect his ruin, have not scrupled to enter into an alliance with him.<sup>2</sup>

Such is the grand drama . . . . for which the teaching of Zoroaster, imparted to the Jews, prepared the way. . . . . The union of Judaism with the doctrines of Plato gave birth to the Greek Philonic philosophy ; and finally, the disciples of this school make their appearance in Christianity, carrying with them, in part at least, their own language. If we pursue this path, we cannot fail ere long to be convinced that we shall soon witness the last effort of ancient Paganism, which is once more rallying its forces for a supreme struggle with its Conqueror, before abandoning the field to Him." Our author goes on as follows:—" If by this means we have been led to discover that the old institutions, or at least the doctrines which were embodied in their ceremonial, survived in the East until the thirteenth century of the Christian era, notwithstanding the desperate conflict of which we have been speaking, and if it be further proved that Gnosticism was still flourishing up to the epoch of the first Crusades, it will be easy to understand how the Christians of the West, i.e., the Crusaders, were brought into contact with these Gnostic Christians, and had the opportunity afforded them of adopting some of their peculiar tenets and mysterious customs ; amongst others, that of progressive initiation into secret lore. The foregoing facts once clearly established, our supposition will no longer lack ration," "non-interference with the beliefs of others," "tolerance of Christianity, in a modified form at least," and why the Bible has a place on the "altar" of the lower Lodges in this country.

abundant proof, if it be further found that, amongst the Western warriors, an association speedily formed itself, which, in opposition to the creed of Rome and the universal faith of Europe at that time, took upon itself to recognise the existence only of a God whose being is coeval with that of matter, who is incapable of division into a plurality of persons, who is not subject to human infirmities, and, consequently, neither has died nor can die. . . . And would not our supposition be yet more triumphantly proved if to this elementary doctrine another were added, namely, that Christ could not have been God, but was merely a being of superior intelligence, a Philosopher, a Sage, a Benefactor of humanity ; if it were asserted that miracles must necessarily be rejected as a violation of the eternal and immutable laws of the universe, alike impossible and needless, God requiring no such means of enforcing the obedience of His creatures ? Are not these doctrines, which indisputably derive their origin immediately from Gnosticism, the fundamental principles of Freemasonry ? Does the Freemason divide into several persons the incomprehensible Being whom he denominates the Supreme Architect of all worlds ? Does he believe that death was, or ever could be, possible to this Supreme Being, or that the exercise of His will alone is not sufficient to form a law for mankind ?” After indulging in the violent onslaughts on ecclesiastical hierarchies, dogma, and discipline, invariably found in writings of this class, Juge finally refers to an historical document preserved to this day by the Templars of Paris, which he proves to be of incontestable authority, and to furnish incontrovertible proofs of the correctness of his assertions.

Thus we find the most Holy Trinity, the divinity of Christ, together with all that follows from that doctrine, the possibility of miracles, in a word, the whole scheme of Christianity, denied by the organ of Freemasonry, in its name and with its approval, whilst the lowest form of natural religion is set forth as the only system recognised by the Secret Society, and an irreconcilable war is further declared, with the sanction of the same Society, against the Cross. The foregoing, besides other documentary proofs, were published by the Belgian Neut; at the same time he challenged the League, in the most public manner possible, to contradict them. In spite of this challenge, we find him about ten years later speaking in the following terms at the Catholic Congress at Mechlin in 1867:—"I have everywhere challenged Freemasons to prove the unauthenticity of my documents, if it can be proved. I have sent my writings gratis to the editors of Masonic periodicals, begging that they would refute them, if this were possible, but they have invariably kept silence. I am ready to guarantee that everything I have printed is perfectly genuine, and I defy any adversary to show me to be guilty of inaccuracy in this respect. I have clamorously called for some notice, even though it were of an unfavourable nature, but all in vain; I have never received an answer" ("Assemblée Générale des Catholiques de Malines, 1867," Bruxelles, 1868, p. 340).

Members of the lower affiliated Lodges, Apprentices, Fellow-crafts, and Master-Masons, who are still groping in the twilight, will doubtless pronounce the testimony we have just brought forward (since they find it cannot be either contradicted or denied) to be the exaggerations of a few individual Freemasons. Therefore, if we wish to be clear on the matter, we must ascend to one of the higher grades of the Craft, where full daylight is admitted, to that of Rosicrucian, the 18th of the Scotch Grade, spoken of by the Prince of Orange in the Apology we mentioned above. The allegorical legend has for its subject the murder of the architect Adoniram, and the recovery of the password lost at his death, and believed to be the word Jehovah, which, with the secret meaning attached to it, is communicated to those who are initiated into the grade of a Master of the Scotch rite. In this manner the Scotch Master is made "High Priest." If we strip the legend of its fanciful dress, there remains pure Deism, in which every man is declared to be his own priest, perfectly independent of all revealed religion. But the adept must further be told who, in the character of Adoniram's murderer, buried the password, i.e., Deism, and against whom on that account he must ever cherish a bitter and undying hatred, and wage war without intermission. For this purpose the grade of Rosicrucian is intended. However reluctant we are to enter upon the subject of the insane ceremonial of the Craft, it is impossible always to avoid doing so, especially as some knowledge of the rites attending upon initiation into the higher grades of Masonic science is indispensable to the elucidation of the matter we have in hand.<sup>1</sup> The walls of the Lodge are hung with black cloth. In the background is an altar, and over it a transparency on which are three crosses, the middle one bearing the usual inscription I.N.R.I. The Brethren sit round in deepest mourning, all clad in sacerdotal vestments, to signify that in natural religion to be a man and a priest means the same. Leaning their head upon their hand, they remain in profound silence, and betray sorrow and dejection. No one can fail to see the very obvious allusion to the day of our Lord's Crucifixion. After a while the President asks the Senior Warden what is the hour? The answer runs thus:—"It is the first hour of the day, the moment when the veil of the temple was rent, darkness and horror overspread the face of the earth, the light was extinguished, the tools of Masons were broken, the blazing sun disappeared from heaven, the cubical stone was shattered to pieces, the mystic word was lost!" In other words, the murderer of Adoniram, the deadly enemy of Masonic theory and practice, is He who on Good Friday died the death of the cross. The inscription on the cross also has its interpretation, namely this:—"The Jew of Nazareth led by the Jew Raphael to Jerusalem." Here, under the designation of a common Jew, led up to Jerusalem by another Jew, to receive the just penalty of his crimes, we have Christ the Lord; for the deadly foe of Freemasonry is no other than He.<sup>1</sup> As soon as the candidate has shown by his answers that he understands I.N.R.I. aright, the "Venerable" exclaims joyfully, "My Brethren, the word is found again!" This exclamation is greeted by the initiated with acclamation,<sup>2</sup> for another has been added to the number of those who hate the Nazarean malefactor and withstand His work, who are even prepared, if need be, to demonstrate openly the sentiments they

"Freemasons consider the initial letters I.N.R.I. as standing for the following words:—Judea, Nazareth, Raphael, Judah.

"Where do you come from?—From Judea.

Through what town have you passed?—Through Nazareth.

Who has been your guide?—Raphael.

Of what tribe are you?—The tribe of Judah."

The last question appears to be interchangeable with the one to which Jerusalem is the answer. The difference is quite immaterial.

entertain by publicly partaking of flesh-meat on Good Friday.

As a matter of fact, the religious aims of Freemasonry lie at the bottom of all the collective efforts of Liberalism in the present day within the domain of the Church, although perhaps the majority of the easy-going members of the Lodges are ignorant of the fact. Refined prudence only lifts the veil for each one so far as to admit just as much light as his eyes are capable of bearing. In the "Disclosures of a Freemason on his Deathbed,"<sup>1</sup> the following cautions are published by Von Haller:—"The explanation of our moral system (i.e. religion) by means of allegories and of symbols must be suited to the varying capabilities of each individual aspirant; for this reason we must be very careful not to give them a meaning of such obvious ambiguity as thereby to make our intentions apparent, or in any way tend to diminish the good faith with which the candidate receives the interpretation given to him. It would be foolish to suppose that every Brother, immediately upon his admission, throws off once for all the prejudices which up to that time held him enslaved. The atmosphere of the Lodge is not potent enough to impart to him instantaneously the spirit of the Order into which he has been admitted. The Catholic and the Protestant, the Jew and the Mohammedan, the members of every possible religious persuasion, must meet here under one banner, without appearing in any way to separate themselves from their own particular sect."

The following laws, binding on Masons in general, whatever their degree, may serve in further support of the point we have been endeavouring to prove:—

1. Every Brother who is received must propose to himself the object set forth in the catechism of the Lodges as the final aim of all the efforts of the Craft—namely, to build temples for virtue and prisons for vice, or to shed light upon the initiated; that is, to dispel the darkness shrouding the whole world of the profane. Thus Freemasonry has a system of teaching peculiar to itself, whether called by the name of morality or of religion, in comparison to which all positive religions, even those that term themselves Christian, are but error and darkness.

2. The Masonic system of chronology differs from the Christian, the time of the "true light" being reckoned from the creation of the world, in proof that the light of Freemasonry is older than all positive religions—even than the Christian—and that it dates from the first man. Thus we see it can be none other than that system of natural religion under which complete unbelief seeks to screen itself.

3. In the language of the initiated, all Lodges are “temples;” these represent the universe, and have accordingly their four quarters of north, south, east, and west. The Jew and the Christian, the Mussulman and the Fetish worshipper—in short, the adherents of every possible creed—have indiscriminate access to this temple, and are there admitted to the “light,” that is, the knowledge of true virtue, pure faith, and unmixed happiness, retaining meanwhile the observances of their various sects. That which appears to the contented Freemason to be a philanthropic association, rising superior to all considerations of religious truth or error, all differences of Christian, heathen, and Jew, is, in point of fact, an habitual carrying out of religious indifferentism into daily life, until the conviction that all religions are equally worthless gradually dawns upon the mind of one individual after another, and qualifies for admission into higher grades of the Craft. Thus the time comes ever nearer when the mass of mankind will be prepared to receive that as their law which was formerly a secret known to a few only of the initiated.

4. Freemasonry communicates its “light” under the most awful and detestable oaths of secrecy.<sup>1</sup> If virtue and truth tremble for their very existence because of some powerful oppressor, as was the case with Christianity in the time of the Roman emperors, one can readily understand that its teaching must be whispered in secret, not proclaimed amidst the throng of the market-place. But the disciples of truth and virtue are bound to stand forth boldly when occasion calls for public confession, and at such time concealment would be a crime on their part. If the teaching of Freemasonry is in harmony with the laws of Christianity and the peace of states, what has it to fear from Pope or king? And if not, we can only say, it is impossible for that to be good to which concealment is habitual, and even indispensable.

5. What is it Freemasonry conceals with such scrupulous care? Not its spirit of brotherly love and mutual assistance, a feature none can fail to praise, although it is reserved for the disciples of the Gospel to exhibit it in fullest perfection; not its festive gatherings, although these are not always of an unexceptionable nature. On the contrary, the initiated appear most willing to speak of them, even in their printed publications. There must, therefore, be something at the bottom of the League which its members cannot and dare not mention.

6. We would remind any one who still shares the opinion of the First Napoleon, who pronounced Freemasonry to be "much ado about nothing," that this verdict in itself amounts to a criminal conviction, when we consider that, if it be true, mankind has for centuries been made the victim of a gigantic fraud, the sacredness of oaths has been systematically profaned, and exalted persons who have joined the Society in all good faith have been made the laughing-stock of the populace.

Let us no longer deceive ourselves. The greatest service we can render to the initiated members of the Craft is to represent the whole affair as mere child's play, and describe the sound of the shells exploding in our midst as the harmless report of a drawing-room toy. The signs of the times are too plain to allow of this; all must see that we have to encounter a preconcerted attack on Christianity. We are indeed confident that this is a citadel which can never be destroyed; but we ought, at the same time, to remember the warning our Lord addressed to a careless and negligent people:—"The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation yielding the fruits thereof" (Matt. xxi. 43).

CHAPTER V.

THE COVERT WARFARE OF THE SECRET SOCIETY AGAINST MONARCHY.

THE further we penetrate into the real secrets of Freemasonry, the more careful must we be not to include in one sweeping censure all who belong to it. On the contrary, we distinctly assert that its three lowest grades, especially, include among their members many loyal subjects of authority—men who would not for a moment hesitate to abandon all connection with the Society if the scales which have grown over their eyes could only be removed. Such persons may be frequently heard to complain that the door leading to the higher grades of the Order is kept closed against them;<sup>1</sup> and not a few, grown weary of the perpetual delay, have quitted an association in which they expected to learn so much, and have in reality learnt so little. But our business, as we remarked before, is not with persons, but with things.

<sup>1</sup> It may be interesting to the reader to learn the names of the various grades, which we give according to the Scotch rite. They are taken from Thuileur :—“ Thuileur portatif des trente-trois degrés de l'Écossisme du rit ancien et accepté, suivi du thuileur des trois grades symboliques écossais, tels qu'ils sont pratiqués dans la grande loge d'Écosse à Edimbourg. Paris, au magasin de Librairie Maçonique, rue S. André-des-Arcs, n. 57, 1819—1. Apprenti; 2. Compagnon; 3. Maître; 4. Maître

Three weapons are needed to enable the League to accomplish its ultimate designs: namely, Knowledge; Force, employed opportunely; and a Secret Propaganda, to permeate as widely as possible the most influential circles of society. Thus the Lodges may be divided into three classes—Lodges of Learning, of Action, and of Adoption.

The first comprises the learned world, as far as it belongs actually, or in spirit, to the Secret Society. Taking its stand upon freedom of academic instruction—one of the boasted strongholds of the present day—it is able to offer to mankind complete and perfect independence under the garb of science, and has been mainly instrumental in making our Universities and Schools of Art what they now are. The more entirely the Professor corresponds to the Masonic ideal, the more indispensable are his services to the Craft; he must occupy the most important posts, be frequently nominated to positions of prominence; give its tone to the educated world, above all, the secret; 5. Maître parfait; 6. Secrétaire intime; 7. Prévôt et Juge; 8. Intendant des Bâtimens; 9. Maître élu des Neuf; 10. Illustre élu des Quinze; 11. Sublime Chevalier élu; 12. Grand-Maître-Architecte; 13. Royale-Arche; 14. Grand-Écossais de la voûte sacrée; 15. Chevalier d'Orient; 16. Prince de Jérusalem; 17. Chevalier d'Orient et d'Occident; 18. Rose-Croix d'Héredom de Kilwining; 19. Grand-Pontife; 20. Vénérable Grand-Maître ad vitam; 21. Noachite, ou Chevalier Prussien; 22. Chevalier Royale-Hache; 23. Chef du Tabernacle; 24. Prince du Tabernacle; 25. Chevalier du Serpent d'airain; 26. Écossais, trinitaire, ou Prince du Liban; 27. Grand-Commandeur du Temple; 28. Chevalier du Soleil; 29. Écossais de St André; 30. Chevalier Kadosch; 31. Grand-Inspecteur, Inquisiteur-Commandeur; 32. Sublime Prince du Royal Secret; 33. Souverain Grand-Inspecteur-Général." The three last grades are merely honorary.

casting-vote must ever be his in the assemblies of savants and demi-savants, as well as in the Parliament supposed to represent the popular mind. Should he be a Galen or a Justinian, care is taken that he shall be rich in honours and in gold. It is scarcely necessary to add, that the regulations of the Craft, binding on the common herd, are wonderfully relaxed in favour of such a man as this.

The Lodge of Action, or Red Lodge, is composed of the most determined Radicals, who, impatient of the slow process whereby their secret doctrines are to be gradually introduced into the world of science, of politics, and of society, deem the fruit already ripe, and want to tear it from the tree with one bold snatch. The earlier Carbonari, together with "Young Switzerland" and "Young Germany," were offshoots from this Lodge; while the International itself may justly be termed its standing army.<sup>1</sup> In Italy it was, and still is, represented by Mazzini and Garibaldi; in Spain, by Zorilla; in France, by the Radicals; whilst in Belgium it prevails almost exclusively, and is only held in check by the Catholic tone of a large majority of the population. Wherever it comes into unavoidable collision with Moderate or Blue Freemasonry, it is sure of careful handling, as was shown by the game carried on between the two Red leaders of Italy and the various Ministries of the United Monarchy. There is, indeed, no reason why these two parties should injure one another; in their views and aims they are as closely allied as Orestes and Pylades, only a little

The Lodge of Adoption, or Blue Freemasonry, is a harbour of refuge for the Epicurean and the Bourgeois-gentilhomme, the commercial traveller and the rising artisan, as well as for the youthful aspirant to distinction in civil or military service. This Society is supposed to keep clear of politics. When a so-called reactionary Ministry is in power, it devotes itself to works of philanthropy and mutual benevolence, as well as to common participation in the pleasures of the table; when a Liberal Ministry is in office, it fawns upon it with abject servility, does the work of a secret police, and is never weary of lauding to the skies the wisdom of the rulers, and the prosperity of the people. This body of men compose the main force of the Liberals, and are, like the great mass of the people, at the disposition of their leaders, employed to secure success when anything important is at stake. For even the most unenlightened cannot fail to know that the real leaders keep in the background; they belong to higher grades, and on them it devolves to mark the pace at which the army under their command is to march. Should they start too early, or journey too far, brotherly love knows how to whisper in the ear of those in authority a word which shall effectually obviate all necessity of expelling them from the Craft. Anderson's "Book of Constitutions" expressly states, that "a Brother who has taken part in sedition against the State, without being guilty of any other crime, need not on that account be expelled from his Lodge." This proves, at the same time, that the rule forbidding all members of the three lower or symbolic grades to engage in politics is not to be taken in its most literal sense.

We are prepared to bring forward proofs that this division of the agents of the Secret Society into the three classes of thinkers, workers, and supernumeraries is no imaginary one. The following important instructions are found in the publication "Disclosures," &c. (Révélation, &c., 11-14), already quoted above. We insert them verbatim :—"The teaching of Freemasonry is very influential, but let us bear in mind that it is never to be suddenly or explicitly unfolded before the eyes of aspirants, for an unfettered mind might draw from it conclusions highly prejudicial to our secret designs. We must know how, as soon as the sacred words Liberty and Equality have been uttered in the hearing of the candidate, to anticipate his thoughts, arrest their course in time, or change their current; for this our symbols and hieroglyphics form a happy expedient, opportunely diverting his mind by directing attention to the manifold nature of the objects presented to his notice. This wise method of proceeding is the result of the sagacious policy of our founder, who was far too deeply versed in the knowledge of the human heart not to mix the mysterious and bewitching draught which we must continually hold to the lips, and instil into the soul, of every Brother with such consummate skill, that its true nature shall ever remain a secret, and its real properties be hidden under an innocent exterior.

Thus, in our truly illustrious Order, the amount of lore imparted must ever be proportioned to the capabilities of the recipient ; and in order to facilitate the spread of our doctrines, and to render their signification more or less apparent, we divide our neophytes into three different and distinct classes—the first comprising the inquiring minds, the second the impetuous and restless spirits, the third the superstitious and credulous souls. The doctrine to be expounded to each of these several classes is in itself one and the same, but the time and manner of imparting it must in each case be different. To the first-named class the true meaning appears at once as matter to be apprehended by mind and heart, and they take it in at a glance, as it is immediately and fully unveiled to them by their enlightened Brethren! In their case it is indispensable to employ at once every means, and bring into play all possible skill, in order to kindle their enthusiasm and keep it aflame, by representing to them that the light of the blazing star is the uniting bond and mainstay of our Association. With regard to the second class, composed of the turbulent and restless among our subjects, the duty devolves on us of leading them up by slow degrees to the lofty convictions we have mentioned. It is necessary to let them guess and grope their way amidst the symbols and parables presented to their notice, so that these may serve as a drag upon the wheel of their heated imagination, and prevent any troublesome aberrations. From the third class—the superstitious and credulous souls, amongst whom will invariably be found some of those dullards who seem created for the sole purpose of perpetuating a stupid ignorance—nothing more can be expected than that they should follow in a blind unreasoning manner the dictates of our teaching; but this teaching must only be communicated to them according to the measure of their understanding, in order that they may receive it with avidity, practise it with care, and adhere to it with fidelity, fearful lest they violate the secret oath by which the loyalty of every fresh recruit is to be secured.<sup>1</sup> Thus by imperceptible degrees must that light be admitted by which, in the course of time, the whole globe is to be enlightened, and thus we shall at length behold fully developed that great and wondrous system which is to purify the earth and restore her primeval glory.<sup>2</sup> We must at all times take care not to reveal our real aim precipitately, since weak minds might be dazzled at first by so brilliant and searching a light. From time to time some few rays must be allowed to penetrate the gloom, in order gradually to accustom the eye to that resplendent light which is destined at some future day to illuminate the whole earth; but we must moderate a glare which, if too piercing, might produce blindness—a result more fatal to them and to our Order than the darkness from which we seek to extricate them.” Such are the instructions of the secret document; they afford abundant proof that Freemasons must be divided into the three classes we have named, and judged of accordingly if we would reconcile the many apparent contradictions with which we meet.

<sup>1</sup> In what an unfortunate position does this place the simple member of the Craft! He swears by all he holds sacred that he has never heard the least word of harm in his "temple," and at once sets down the writings we quote from as the fabrication of a Belgian Ultramontane. If his social position entitles him to high rank in the Craft, he may possibly reach the highest grade of all, and still, especially if he seldom take part in active proceedings, remain in absolute ignorance of all that goes on. The Greek tragic poet said truly, that against folly even the gods themselves fight in vain.

<sup>2</sup> This view of the subject implies that the earth has been a great sufferer through the revelations of the Old and New Testament, and the social order built up upon them, so that it needs to be made a tabula rasa.

This distinction is especially necessary if we wish to comprehend the real and peculiar position of Freemasonry with regard to Monarchy. We here employ this word in its widest sense, as applicable not merely to the lawful wearer of the crown, but also to all civil authority, in as far as it represents supreme power on particular points, and requires obedience from its subjects in the name of God as a matter of conscience.

The “Word” plays a great part in Freemasonry, as in all Societies which are veiled from the gaze of the profane. The design is, to express the thing signified in the most concise form, and one by which the outside world may be led to suspect nothing, while nobler natures may have their interest aroused, the half-initiated and unsuspecting may not feel alarmed, and the initiated, when called upon to speak, may be enabled to make himself half or wholly understood by his hearers, according to their different degrees; the whole audience nevertheless enjoying the pleasing delusion that they have perfectly comprehended all that was said. The two sacramental words have already been mentioned; they are Liberty and Equality, and are contained in the name of Masonic Free Brethren. All speeches and songs of the Lodges revolve round these two centres. Formerly it was strictly forbidden to place them in juxtaposition, or in any way to couple the words together; in some parts, this rule may yet be in force, and may be the reason why we generally find one of the two treated of separately and magnified alone. But this veil of caution was to be torn away abruptly. On the 12th August 1792, the very day on which the unfortunate Louis XVI. was declared, after a trial which lasted forty-eight hours, to have forfeited his throne, and was led captive to the Temple, the legislative body passed a vote, deciding that from this time the date of Equality should be added to that of Liberty; in fact, the warrant for the King's capture bore this date, "4th year of Liberty, 1st year and 1st day of Equality." Barruel, an eye-witness of the events of that period, and also himself intimately acquainted with many Freemasons in Paris, relates that the Brethren, considering that the time had come when they were free to publish the secret they had sworn to keep, shouted aloud, "At last our goal is reached; from this day France will be one vast Lodge, and all Frenchmen Freemasons; the rest of the world will soon follow our example." He declares that he himself heard some of the most reticent of the Masons proclaiming publicly, "At last the object of our League has been attained, Equality and Freedom; all men are Brothers and equals : 'all men are free,' was the whole purport of law, the goal of our wishes, in fact, our great secret." Long before these events took place, Barruel had been received into the Order against his will, by dispensation from the regular oath; he had once witnessed a reception, more in keeping with the rules than his own had been, at the close of which the "Worshipful" thus addressed the candidate, who had just been sworn in and received as a Brother:—"My dearest Brother, the secret of Freemasonry consists in these words, Equality and Liberty: all men are free, all men are equal, all men are brethren."

Taken in their best acceptation, these words can be repeated by any one. We are free, delivered from the bondage of sin, free members of society, living under the rule of law, not of arbitrary power. We are equals, children of the same Heavenly Father; we ought therefore to love as brethren and relieve one another in time of need. Hence we understand how some of the best men are entrapped into joining the Craft. Barruel himself testifies that, of his own Lodge, during the Reign of Terror, the simple members showed a leaning towards Monarchy, whilst the "Worshipful" remained what he was before, a furious Jacobin.

Social intercourse with a circle of loyal Brothers and apparently well-disposed friends is an agreeable recreation even for a king, especially as he rarely knows what it is to have a real friend, or to escape from the shackles of court etiquette; and since its dark and terrible aspect is concealed from his view with a fabulous dexterity, why should he suspect any evil designs in this League? To Freemasons it is a matter of still greater moment to have the head of the State or one of his nearest relatives as their Patron, to reckon his counsellors among their members, or to procure for one of the most deeply initiated of their Craft the nomination to some post of importance. On page 18 of the "Disclosures," already often quoted, we read as follows:—"Liberty and Equality, as figured by Solomon's Temple, form the most powerful of auxiliaries in continually advancing our work, and drawing nearer to our great and lofty end. For these we are indebted to our illustrious Founder. It is of the utmost importance, if we would bring our great designs to a happy conclusion, as well as render their execution a matter of less difficulty and danger, that we spare no effort to get into our power the most prominent members of the clerical and military professions, the civic authorities, the education of the young, kings themselves and princes, especially their children, their counsellors and ministers; in a word, all whose interests might generally clash with our principles."

Here we have an explanation of the cringing submission exhibited by the Craft towards any existing authority which they have not the power to overthrow. When, on the crash of the great Revolution, Napoleon I. appeared as the heir to its fortunes, the Brethren worshipped him in a manner that was absolutely romantic; but no sooner had the conqueror fallen than they destroyed in hot haste all names and emblems that could recall him to mind, and the Grand Orient was no less ready to fall at the feet of Louis XVIII. than it had been at those of his predecessor. When Charles X. and his son were driven away, Brother Lafayette and the Citizen-King, who thought it an honour to belong to us, received the most extravagant ovations from the Lodges, as did also the Republic of the Blue Masons in 1848, and the subsequent author of the coup-d'état, their friend and brother, Napoleon.<sup>1</sup> Proofs of the greatest devotion to the civil authorities, and of a truly romantic patriotism, are also displayed, in the hope of enticing to their "temples" the chiefs of the corporation; so that, this effected, the Freemasons may justly boast, "We wander amidst our adversaries, shrouded in threefold darkness. Their passions serve as wires, whereby, unknown to themselves, we set them in motion, and compel them unwittingly to work in union with us. Under the very shadow of authority Masonry carries on the great work entrusted to her."<sup>2</sup>

The loyal rejoicings of the Order are never to be accepted in good faith, but should be regarded as a mere cloak to cover the most extreme Radicalism. We find convincing proof of this given in the "Disclosures," &c. (p. 27), in the following words:—"Good care must be taken not to express ourselves too plainly concerning absolute liberty and equality before we have made ourselves thoroughly acquainted with the mind of the aspirant, and the force of character he may possess. If we do not find him sufficiently firm, if we have reason to think the position threatens to become critical, we must immediately order to the front a new battery; adopt a milder tone; with all possible skill and prudence soften down the meaning of every phrase; and put our real views quite out of sight. We interpret this Temple of Solomon—that is, Liberty and Equality—as having reference to our Society alone; there is no idea of extending it beyond these limits; anything like rebellion, assertion of independence, casting off authority, are altogether out of the question. Quickly, deftly, and at once, everything must be put in a fresh light, and attention called to the fulfilment of duty, the allegiance due to God, the practice of virtue, the observance of unshaken loyalty to the powers that be. Monsters, tyrants, scourges of humanity are suddenly converted into fathers of their people, representatives of God on earth, kings who deserve our esteem, our homage, our veneration, on account of their sterling personal worth and their exalted dignity and greatness. In a word, to the eyes of such a neophyte, Freemasonry must only aim at promoting the fear of Almighty God, faithful obedience to rulers, humble deference to authority, hatred of evil, love of all that is good and virtuous. At given times, in order the more surely to hurl from its car the Juggernaut which threatens us with destruction, it is necessary to feign to offer it incense and adoration."

It is not difficult for the student of history, the careful observer of the march of events, to see through the tissue of fraud wherewith Freemasonry seeks to undermine regular monarchy. One need only remember the fulsome and degrading flatteries heaped upon the Emperor Joseph II. of Austria, which proved as effectual in destroying his prestige as was the miscarriage of his own plans. Expressions such as these, "Dearest Joseph," "Beloved son," "Great, immortal Joseph," which abound in the pamphlets of the Craft, should never be uttered loud enough to reach the beetling heights where monarchs dwell. It matters not whether a Government has freely consented to be taken in tow by the Secret Society, or whether it is obliged to show its practical gratitude for services received; in either case, the familiar path of "liberty and equality" must be trodden. The first step consists always of measures against the Church, for such strike with the force of a two-edged blade; when once the altar, the main support of the throne, is attacked and robbed of its influence, the Christian part of the population, feeling that those placed over them have wounded them in their sanctum sanctorum, their religion, begin to waver in their confidence in the Government, and in their loyal affection to the hereditary dynasty. A mercenary press and the voices of the Brethren may indeed avail either to stifle the cry which breaks from a suffering people, or to drown it altogether by vociferous praise of the new policy. They may succeed, by tale-bearing and calumny, in bringing into discredit the fidelity of the most true-hearted men ; but by these means the poison of disaffection will be driven back into the very heart's blood of the population, there to produce a slow decline which will eat out the life of the State, and bring about the desired revolution. The second blow is aimed at the aristocracy, those chivalrous defenders of the throne, and traditional champions of justice. When a Government, becoming alive to its danger, seeks to free itself from the fatal embrace of such a foe, its struggles only serve to draw tighter the bonds which bind it. Joseph II. brought down on himself a storm of abuse from all the European Lodges by his decree of December 16, 1785, which laid some restraint on the action of the "so-called Society of Freemasons," and attributed to them underhand proceedings.<sup>1</sup> The war with the Turks was the work of the Secret Society, the plan being hatched by Herzberg and his dear friend Pitt ; one of the heads of the Craft, the Hungarian Count Nicholas Forgasch, personally carrying on an intrigue with Herzberg, in the hope of playing in the country of St Stephen a part similar to that enacted by

Orleans in France; in fact, verses were printed in Hungary, openly giving him the title of King of the country. It was to revenge themselves on Joseph II. that the Freemasons all over Europe espoused the cause of Orleans in his attempt on the Regency; and the same motive induced them to take part with the Emperor's sister in the notorious affair of the diamond necklace, in order through her to expose the monarch whom, at that time, they so cordially hated.<sup>1</sup> Towards the end of his days, this well-meaning monarch recognised his error, and saw who had been his secret enemies; but it was then too late, and the immense moral influence which he might have employed in support of the throne was irretrievably lost. We will pass over the efforts of the Craft—unfortunately only too successful—to involve the Piedmontese King Charles Albert in its toils, and to undermine his dynasty, after having been instrumental in overthrowing the other thrones of Italy; nor will we speak of the banishment of Isabella of Spain, just as she had succeeded in forming a better Ministry: for we do not intend to discuss in detail the events of the present day.

But what is of the greatest importance to our purpose is the proof afforded by these events that Freemasonry is fundamentally opposed to regal and civic authority. At the same time they show that intrigues of an unmistakably revolutionary tendency are not faux pas made by certain recalcitrant members, but a necessary consequence of the fundamental principles of the Society, and that only most imperfectly enlightened Brethren complain of violation of the rules in those very circumstances where the strictest regular observance has been practised.

1. From all that has been stated, it becomes apparent that universal liberty and absolute equality is the object Freemasonry keeps ever in view. This liberty is not the wise control exercised by the nobler and higher part of man over all that is mean and vile in his fallen nature, as inculcated by the Gospel, but it is, on the contrary, a casting off of all restraints in religious, political, and social life; that emancipation of the will and of the passions which never fails ultimately to result in the enslavement of all that is best in man. Liberty for all that is evil, bondage for all that is good!—such is the motto of that Liberalism which is the offspring of Freemasonry; and the word Equality is to be understood as meaning social democracy in its strictest sense. To sum up all, we have before us in these two words, which express everything, an entire political system. In the “Disclosures” (p. 14 seq.) we read as follows:—“Liberty and Equality are the two main advantages towards which our plans must ever tend, the employment of all possible cunning and powers of dissimulation being a matter of course. Hypocrisy must lend us her able assistance. We must continually search and probe vacillating minds, and set them in motion so gently that they may scarcely be aware of the slightest pressure. We must amuse them, carry them along with us, deceive them at the opportune time, make them in love with their own delusions, lull them to sleep in the sweet sense of their new dignity" (of Freemasons), "and only reveal our designs respecting them when the goal is close at hand, and they, lost in the bewildering maze of an enticing and hopeless labyrinth, have neither the power nor the will to strike out into another path. In the end, clinging closely to the guide who has led them thus far, they will be quite prepared to regard the most startling and extravagant revolution as the simple conclusion that must naturally be expected." It is only for the purpose of duping weak or scrupulous persons that Freemasons describe liberty and equality as merely the salt that gives savour to the close bond of amity which unites the Brethren. These principles are really intended to have in due time a world-wide extension, and to form the basis of a new structure of humanity. The names of North, South, East, and West, given to the four walls of the Lodges, sufficiently denote the cosmopolitan nature of the science taught within them. If we remember the extraordinary activity of the propaganda of the Order in every land, it is simply impossible to believe that brotherly intercourse with a circle of friends could be the sole object of the League. Besides, the larger the circle of friends, the weaker grows the friendship. An Association boasting more than sixteen millions of members never is, nor possibly can be, a circle of friends; and, whatever solemn assurances are put forward to the contrary, no one can view it otherwise than as a political union, pledged in the name of Liberty and Equality to acknowledge no monarch and no authority. We read in the Vienna Journal (MSS. for the Brethren, 1st year, No. 2, p. 163 seq.):—"On being asked to give a definition of the real object of the Society, the oracles of the Order at length told us, in answer to the strange request, that benevolence in its widest sense, or, to speak more correctly, the promotion of the welfare of humanity by works of benevolence, was its object. But let us examine the constitutions of our Order, and find how this object is embodied there. To understand this, we must glance at the heavy and interminable chain of evil which humanity drags about with it throughout every quarter of the globe, and on examination we shall find that almost all this evil is the effect of the pernicious influences working in the world, whence arise the prejudices generally prevalent as to foreign birth, inequality of rank, diversities of religion. Let us contemplate this Order, dispersed over the surface of the earth, and we shall see that its main object can be none other than the good of mankind. It is a Society which proposes to itself, as its primary and ultimate end, to banish completely from amongst its members<sup>1</sup> those contemptible considerations of foreign birth, class distinctions, and religious differences, which have produced such lamentable results. Wherefore, one of its first principles is to regard the whole dignity of man as consisting in being what nature has called us to be—creatures of the same race, citizens of the same world, proprietors of the same earth, children of the same mother.” The Sibylline veil in which these words are wrapt is in this instance a tolerably transparent one. With the prejudices of foreign birth the boundaries of States must also be swept away, and with class distinctions the kingly prerogative must likewise fall to the ground. The whole worth of man, besides his virtues (of course only natural ones), lies in the fact of his being a man like other men; and all men are equal, not in the Christian sense of all being children of one Heavenly Father, and fellow-heirs of redemption, but in a purely natural, human, and social sense.

We find the same thing expressed in other words in the “Disclosures” (p. 6 seq.): “The task of dispelling speedily and successfully the shades of night which enveloped humanity, of guiding the steps of mankind out of the region of darkness, and of opening men’s eyes to the light of truth, so long obscured by clouds of error, required an intellect no less powerful than that of our Founder. Therefore, we must ever hold in our hands the tools entrusted to us by that great Master, labouring incessantly to keep them in good condition, and to put them to a worthy use, until the unexpected dénouement shall arrive to startle the world with the most terrible, but at the same time most felicitous, of all revolutions, and confer immortal glory upon that sagacious enemy of all crowned heads. In order to achieve this, no effort must be spared to attract, by the deceptive bait of Brotherhood, an immense multitude of persons, and unite them in the same views, without allowing differences of taste, character, and religion to offer any obstacle. Our teaching must be regulated with consummate skill, in order to animate and keep up this Association, and extend it beyond the limits of its own members to all the inhabitants of the world, so that even the wildest and most primitive races of Central Africa or America shall be included within our embrace. This exalted doctrine, the soul of our Union and the animating spirit of all its members, consists in that radical instinct, the law engraved by nature in every heart, which must ever be the basis of all our transactions—a thirst for liberty and equality.”

<sup>1</sup> And not from amongst its members only, but in due course, and at the right moment, from the whole world, as is plainly to be gathered from the concluding sentence. Further information respecting the universality of these efforts of the League will be given under our fourth head.

Now, what is the King, in the Lodge and in the eyes of the Craft? Simply “Brother So-and-so,” no more nor less than any other Freemason, or any other man. His royal dignity appertains only to the profane world; it is the rough and unhewn stone, which the blows of the Mason’s hammer, the use of his square and plumb-line, is to model into the form of a cube, i.e., a stone of which all the sides are equal. The king takes his place in the Lodge as an equal amongst his equals, one in a circle formed of millions of friends. We are well aware that even to a Prince a real friend is an invaluable treasure, that the most exalted monarchs love to gather round them a small number of trusty companions. But that friendship alone can be termed real in which the Prince remains a Prince, in which his friendship bears the stamp of gracious condescension, and the individual honoured by it is ready to hazard life and limb to defend the rights of his royal friend. Now, according to the views of the Craft, the ruling Sovereign is an equal, a "Brother," on a level with all other initiated Brethren, soon to stand on the same footing with all the whole human race. However this bitter fruit of the secret teachings of Freemasonry may be concealed from him by intoxicating draughts of exultant adulation, the venomous serpent of treason ever lurks under the roses of loyalty. The Craft recognises no monarchy.

2. In his character of Brother and equal, the King has, according to Masonic teaching, no right of command. This follows as the logical consequence of what we have just stated; but as it has hitherto been our rule to prove everything step by step, we will make no exception in the present case. Brother Lamartine, by no means the reddest of the red, member and President of the Provisionary French Government in 1848, expressed his conviction that "the great ideas which were at the bottom of the popular risings in 1789, 1830, and 1848 were the offspring of Freemasonry." These so-called great ideas, however, denied the existence of monarchical rights. One of the organs of the League, a Jewish Brother named Weil, thus writes: "We exercise a mighty influence on the course of events and the progress of civilisation, in the work of spreading Republicanism amongst the people."<sup>1</sup> This means that the spread of Masonic principles will bring about the emancipation of nations, and at last teach them that no king possesses the right to command them. Brother Börne likewise says: "We have shaken the pillars on which the old building rests, with such force, that they must soon give way." This "old building" is the Christian State, the Throne, and the Altar. The "Disclosures" (p. 10) speak no less plainly on this point:—"By means of liberty and equality, our much-prized prerogatives, we must seek to dry up the tainted fountains whence flow all the ills of mankind; we must obliterate every trace of the degrading differences of station, which obtrude themselves upon our notice; we must restore man to his primeval rights, no longer recognising rank and dignity, two things the mere sight of which offends the eye of man and wounds his self-love. Obedience is a mere chimera, and has no place in the wise plans of Providence; it rests upon the caprices of fate" (royal birth), "and the exorbitant demands of a pride which is resolved that everything shall bend before it, and which regards the creatures inhabiting the world" (mankind) "as a low and despicable race of beings, created for the sole purpose of serving it as slaves." If every kind of authority is a violation of the hereditary rights of man, if to be born to the purple is only a freak of chance, and to wear it is an unpardonable exaltation of self at the expense of one's fellow-men, then every act of obedience is a folly and a degradation, and no king possesses the right to rule.<sup>1</sup>

3. According to these doctrines, it is criminal on the part of any ruler to persist in asserting his right to power. If complete political equality is an unalienable and primitive right peculiar to mankind, any encroachment on it is a glaring offence. Hence Brother Juge, in the treatise we have already quoted, speaks of "kingly greed;" hence, too, we so often meet with words such as "despot" and "tyrant," while the "Colossus" which is to be overthrown means just the same thing. The concluding sentences of the "Disclosures," p. 28, run as follows:—"Let us keep our eyes continually fixed upon the

Temple of Solomon (the reconstruction of modern society) and upon our emblems; but never let us permit the real significance of our teaching to be known, except in the Lodge of a few select Brethren! . . . . Courage, Fraternity, Unity, Perseverance! Let us arm ourselves with this invisible light, and cherish within our hearts a courage worthy of the loftiest souls. My Brethren, let it be our firm conviction that we represent the lantern of Diogenes, that we are fiery meteors of terrible omen to tyrants. Unbroken transmission of our doctrine makes us immortal, our unity renders us invincible; to our blows is it reserved to fell this Colossus." These blows, however, were represented publicly as virtuous actions and heroic deeds, and the point at issue is to do away with the produce of a criminal and unhealthy state of society, the plague of Monarchy.

4. Thus according to the express teaching of Freemasonry, kingly dominion, and indeed all authority in general, is to be extirpated; in this way man will see the dawn of a second Golden Age. Let us listen to the words of the Masons themselves: "At first this independence, this casting off of all supremacy and all power, must be represented, even among ourselves, as only the restoration of the Golden Age, that happy time of which poets sing, when a beneficent Deity came and ruled the earth's first inhabitants with a sceptre of flowers. By this Golden Age we mean those peaceful years when hearts, free from passions, were strangers to the sting of jealousy; when pride, covetousness, and other vices were unknown ; when men were free and equal, ruling their conduct according to the laws of Nature alone, and recognising no other differences amongst themselves than those which wise Mother-Nature had herself established. But whereas nothing short of a miracle can work so sudden a change, and any premature action can only result in failure, we must set to work with skill and the greatest caution, until men are freed from those universal and ancient" (i.e., religious) "prejudices which, by robbing simple souls of their strength and peace of mind, drag them into a deep abyss of error, and bring them into subjection to the passions of those imperious tyrants" (kings) "who are devoured by ambition and avarice. . . . Our policy must be unfolded ever with vast skill and a certain amount of mystery to the aspirant ; we must confine ourselves to representing to him this freedom and equality as a most delightful thing, a happiness reserved for our Order alone : without losing sight of our real aim. We must thoroughly imbue him with our spirit, until habit becomes second nature to him, and the hour arrives when our Society finds itself strong enough to muster the whole world under its banner. Up to that time, we must depict our Society to him as an elect family, free from those stormy passions and gnawing cares of which mankind is the victim ; a family which, rocked in the bosom of beautiful nature, lives over again the Golden Age, and from its safe harbour looks out with pitying eye over the wide sea of error in which its hapless fellow-men are struggling in the present hour. We must hold fast the fundamental principle of our Order, that all our Brother Masons" (in the lower grades) "are only our soldiers and workmen, whilst we are their generals and the great architects commissioned by Freedom to construct a vast edifice—i.e., the reform of the human race, through the destruction of kings, those scourges of humanity." After the secret document has counselled that the Order be recruited as far as possible from the youth of the upper classes, even of the aristocracy, it thus proceeds:—"In education, we must gently instil the essence of our teaching in its most attractive form, and, without exciting the least suspicion, insensibly prepare those in high places for the blow which will annihilate them, endeavouring to weaken their prestige and destroy the power they have usurped over their fellow-men by means of well-known writers, whose views are in harmony with our plans. We must inspire inferiors with ambition, and with jealousy of their superiors, teaching them to despise and hate all whom chance has placed above them. They must thus be gradually led on to insubordination, by being skilfully shown that to require loyalty and fidelity proves an immoderate thirst for power, and is an unwarrantable outrage on the rights of men. . . . Thus we shall induce young hearts who are incapable of discerning our real end to help us in accomplishing our great work, and in restoring to man the noble independence bestowed on him by his Creator as a peculiar prerogative which alone distinguishes him from the rest of creation." From these words it may plainly be inferred how intimate is the connection existing between modern educational legislation and the designs of Freemasonry upon thrones and authorities. They may repeat over and over again a thousand times how they merely wish to lessen the influence of the Clergy and strengthen the power of the State; the more loudly their words proclaim fidelity to the State, the more firmly we believe a contrary feeling to exist in their hearts.

The abolition of monarchy and of authority in general is symbolised in the Masonic legends by Solomon's temple. This temple in Jerusalem, built at the command of God by the wisest of kings, remained standing for a long period, a pile of wondrous magnificence, dedicated to the worship of the true God. But after the lapse of centuries, a mighty host came from the East, and destroyed the building, carrying away into cruel captivity in Babylon the people of God. At length the hour of deliverance approached; a heathen king, divinely inspired, set free the captives, and gave them permission to rebuild their temple, furnishing them besides with the means of accomplishing this undertaking. Let us now hearken to the interpretation of this scriptural history, as given by the Craft in its own words:—
"The temple in its first glory is an image of the primeval condition of man, when he had been created out of nothing; religion, and the ceremonial of religion, is simply the carrying out of that great law of nature implanted in every heart, having its root in those principles of mutual charity and toleration which all men are bound to observe. The destruction of the temple and the thralldom of the servants of the living God is emblematic of the pride, ambition, and greed which have brought into the world dependence and slavery. The Assyrians and their merciless host denote kings, princes, and governors, whose power has laid a galling yoke on the neck of so many oppressed peoples. Finally, the chosen people entrusted with the rebuilding of the temple represent our enlightened Brethren and Freemasons, whose mission it is to reintroduce amongst mankind that liberty and equality which is its distinctive prerogative, and thus restore to our planet her lost glory " ("Revelations," p. 21 seq.).

Here, then, we see what the much-boasted philanthropy of Freemasonry—"benevolence in its widest sense," as they call it—is driving at. In order to throw dust into the eyes of the public, collections are made in the Lodges on the occasion of any national calamity, and the amount of the same ostentatiously published. In some parts, as, for instance, in Holland, schools are established for the orphans of Freemasons; and a portion of the immense profits returned by the mercantile transactions carried on by members of the Craft is devoted to objects professing to be of general utility, but really confined to the interests of Freemasonry. In this manner patronage is gained, adversaries are silenced, and a favourable impression is made on the unreflecting portion of the upper classes. But their benevolent exertions always have been, and always will be, attempts to bring back the "golden age of universal liberty and equality" by means of the destruction of authority throughout the world. In a speech delivered at a celebration of the centenary of the Middleburgh Lodge, "La Compagnie durable," "Brother" Tiffle spoke thus:—"Our avowed object is the amelioration of the whole human race; not by making proselytes for ourselves, or for any religious persuasion or form of government whatsoever, but exclusively through benevolence, in the widest acceptation of the term. Our Lodges are schools, where we learn from one another the Royal Art of regulating our actions in such a manner that they may serve as a rule and example for every rational being. From the windows of our temples the eternal flame, burning upon our altars with a clear and vivid brightness, must shine forth upon the surface of the earth, so that all nations may walk by its light. Thus the partitions will not have to be thrown down; they will gradually fall of themselves, rewarding the labours of Freemasonry, and enabling it to clasp all,—our sisters" (the female sex) "assuredly included—in its comprehensive embrace." The allusions made by Tiffle in this speech are fully explained by what has been said in a former part of this work. We can also now understand why Freemasonry is pleased to call itself the "Royal Art," since it claims to have discovered the secret whereby all men can be happily governed—namely, by the abolition of monarchy and all manner of authority, and by the restoration of absolute liberty and equality.

V. In order to attain the end aimed at, Religion, the basis of authority, is to be uprooted. The designs of the Secret Society are, as we have already shown, completely antagonistic to Christianity, and identical with those of Voltaire. Several of the authorities we have quoted do not attempt to conceal that the Altar will be overturned at the same time as the Throne, if not before it, as being its principal bulwark. The following sentences from the "Disclosures" (p. 23 seq.) are sufficiently explicit :—" Since it has been man's unhappy fate to survive the destruction of his distinctive rights" (liberty and equality!) "and to sink from the glorious position of the independence he once held ; since he is now in a state of subjection, is branded with ignominy, lies helpless in the abyss which the pride and ambition of his fellow-men have dug for him, and into which his indifference to his own real interests has enabled them to precipitate him—under these circumstances it becomes his bounden duty to rise up once more and wave aloft the standard of independence and equality wrested from him by the tyrant's hand, planting it upon the corpses of those pitiless monsters who were the original authors of man's fall. But if, on the other hand, man is himself to blame for his misfortune" (by the free election of a king) ; “ if his degradation is the work of his own arm, his eyes must be opened to see the fetters he has forged for himself. He must grasp the helping-hand we hold out to him, in order to burst his bonds and enable him to overcome in his turn the hated oppressor. For the Brethren of our Craft it is reserved to achieve this triumph—that is, to gather together in one vast corporation all the different families of nations who, originally all parts of one great whole, have become separated and scattered, and in proportion to their divergence from the common centre mutually estranged, to such a degree that they no longer have any desire to be reunited, and to compose once more the body of which they were formerly members. Let it be ours, my Brethren, to extinguish the torch of dissension which is consuming the world, and kindle in its stead that light by whose fructifying beams our race is to be created anew in vernal perfection and increased purity.<sup>1</sup> Soon, like a second Moses, shall we set these groaning nations free ; soon will all tyrants fall, and their power crumble at the sight of the wonders accomplished by our arm made strong in the justice of its cause. . . . It has not been by means of force alone that man has been robbed of liberty and equality ; ignorance and superstition have also been brought to bear, in order to blind his eyes, and prevent his claiming again the possessions so unjustly taken from him. Kings, those unfortunate tyrants, wishing to plant on a sure foundation the throne they had raised upon ruins, knew well how skilfully to instil into the minds of their subjects the convenient doctrine that religion, the worship most pleasing to God, consists in blind submission and loyal obedience to earthly princes, and that the allegiance due to them cannot be withheld without sacrilege. This snare was cunningly laid, and mankind was decoyed into it by the novel bait of a dogma resting on an utterly false basis; which dogma early inculcated, prevented every murmur, and rocked reason to sleep. Thus man became incapable of perceiving the rational distinction between divine and natural right, and viewed any change of his" (social and political) "condition not merely as a thing impossible, but as an outrage on most sacred rights." The advice is added that all religious idols should be destroyed. From such a point of view no one can deny that, as the religion of Jesus Christ is the true foundation of the throne, and a Christian people is not easily induced to rise in rebellion against its lawful rulers, it follows, therefore, that in Europe every revolution must begin with the Church; for when once the altars are overthrown, and the faithful thrust back into the gloom of the catacombs, thrones will fall as a matter of course. We have for years been called upon to witness in Germany and Austria the furious battle of exoteric

Freemasonry, the Liberal party, against positive Christianity, and all the blessed influences which its external life exercises in the world. In the background stand the Liberal leaders; under their thin disguise we recognise them to be the members of the Craft. We know what the closing scene of the drama will be. The concessions made at the expense of the Church are only instalments paid off before the final winding-up of affairs. They do not appease the hungry creditor; they only incite him to make fresh demands.

VI. An universal revolution is the first step on the road leading to the world-wide republic of the future. The old order of things, resting on religious prejudice and political tyranny, must, says the Freemason, be overthrown, in order that a new temple of humanity, without kings and without authority, may be established on the groundwork of mutual liberty and equality. In other words, an universal republic must be founded. This republic can only be ushered in by the spasmodic throes of an universal revolution, which, although productive of a convulsion more terrible than any the world has ever known, will be attended with the most beneficial results. Innumerable speeches made by Freemasons might be quoted, announcing its near approach. One party amongst the Brethren holds the belief that this end is to be attained by universal extension of the Secret Society, and by getting the education of the rising generation into the hands of the Craft, so that at length monarchs will voluntarily doff their crowns, and officials vacate their posts. The other party, on the contrary, does not dream of any such fools' paradise; and precisely those who belong to the higher grades know—as their ritual alone would suffice to teach them—that nothing short of a desperate revolution can usher in the golden age, along a path strewn with corpses and encumbered with ruins. In the “Astræa, Taschenbuch für Freimaurer von Bruder Sydow,” 1845, p. 85, an orator speaks as follows:—“If the structure of humanity is to advance, the old scaffolding which has hindered the progress of the building must be pulled down, even though all the powers in the world cling to it to uphold it. That which is destined to destruction must in the course of things be destroyed; and if human powers resist this law, at the behest of fate a stronger power” (query, the Chiefs of the Order?) “will appear upon the scene to carry out the eternal decrees of Providence. The Reformation of the Church, as well as the French Revolution, proves the existence of this law. The old scaffoldings shall be forcibly torn away; and if this demolition is punishable by human law, it is nevertheless sanctioned by the Eternal law which presides over the destinies of the human race. Revolution is a crisis necessary to development.”

The same idea is presented in a less didactic and abstract manner in the “Disclosures” (p. 25 seq.), where we read:—“Nothing is difficult to him who dares to undertake everything. The poison must be neutralised by means of its antidote, revolution must succeed to obedience, vengeance follow upon effeminacy, power must grapple with power, and the reign of superstition yield before that of the one true natural religion. . . . The spell has to be broken which has so long held mankind in an ignominious dependence, owing to blindness or false prejudice. The idolatrous worship of tyrants, a degradation of the worship due to the true Divinity, must be done away with ; man, free by nature, must assist his fellow-men in the recovery of their rights, the sacred heirloom of them all. No means must be spared to regain liberty and equality, so essential to man's happiness ; with unconquerable firmness and perseverance all must strive to win them back. We may rest assured that every crime committed in order to secure the good of all is an act of generous virtue, which, sooner or later, cannot fail to bring a rich reward." On this account the candidate for initiation is required to swear implicit obedience to his unknown Superiors in the Order. Barruel states that the oath administered to him on his admission was as follows:—"My Brother, are you prepared to execute every command you may receive from the Grand Master, even should contrary orders be laid on you by King or Emperor, or any other ruler whatsoever?"<sup>1</sup>

Freemasonry has already on one occasion put forth all its strength, with the object of kindling an universal conflagration ; we mean at the time of the French Revolution, the waves of which swept far and wide

into other lands, threatening to devastate the whole Continent of Europe. And even in our own day its ignes fatui are viewed by an ambitious and tyrannical Liberalism as beacons to warn us of danger, instead of wandering lights to lure us to destruction. The simultaneous action of two great influences contributed to bring about this state of things; the pseudo-philosophy of the Encyclopædists in the world of letters, and the practical organisation of their principles in the Masonic Lodges, without which the wished-for result could never have been attained. We are fully aware that not all the Encyclopædists were Freemasons. Voltaire himself only became a member of the Craft when he was in his forty-eighth year, on June 7th, 1778. One thing, however, is certain, that their unaided efforts would no more have been sufficient to bring about the Reign of Terror than a swarm of gnats to darken the sun. It is, moreover, equally certain that these doctrines had for some long time past been known to, and secretly disseminated by, Freemasons; and when the time for action came at last, they were openly proclaimed by them in the streets of Paris. The party-leaders, Mirabeau, Sièyes, Grégoire, Robespierre, Condorcet, Fauchet, Guillotin (of bloody memory), Bonneville, Volney, Philippe Egalité, &c., had all been initiated into the higher grades. The French Revolution was nothing more than Freemasonry in power; its work was crowned on Jan. 21st, 1793, by the death of Louis XVI., or, to borrow the language of the time, "Citizen Capet, last of the race of tyrants." Even Roltech and Welker, in their "Political Lexicon," were constrained to acknowledge that Freemasonry had a share in the French Revolution, and exercised considerable political influence during the period of the Restoration in France, Spain, Italy, and other countries. Wachsmuth also remarks, in his "History of France during the Epoch of the Revolution," vol. i. p. 55, "that the literature of the time immediately preceding that terrible event, the tendency of which was to subvert Church and State, found in Freemasonry a zealous and useful ally."

Such opinions are, of course, always expressed with reserve, the caution with which they are worded being plainly discernible; it will therefore be as well for us to hear what the Craft, as the principal actor, has to say about its own part in the drama enacted during the last decade of the previous century.

Louis Blanc, a member of the Craft, gives us (in his "Histoire de la Révolution Française," vol. ii. c. 3), an idea of the manner in which Freemasons laboured at the work of revolutionising nations. He says:—"It is necessary to conduct the reader to the opening of the subterranean mine laid at that time beneath thrones and altars by revolutionists differing greatly, both in their theory and their practice, from the Encyclopædists. An association had been formed composed of men of every land, every religion, and every class, bound together by mysterious signs agreed upon amongst themselves, pledged by a solemn oath to observe inviolable secrecy as to the existence of this hidden bond, and tested by proofs of a terrible description. These men busied themselves with the performance of fantastic ceremonies and the practice of works of benevolence, recognising amongst themselves no differences of rank, except the Masonic distinctions of Apprentice, Fellow-Craft, and Master-Mason. Thus, we find Freemasonry to have been widely diffused immediately before the outbreak of the Revolution. Spreading over the whole face of Europe, it poisoned the thinking minds of Germany, and secretly stirred up rebellion in France, showing itself everywhere in the light of an association resting upon principles diametrically opposed to those which govern civil society. The very plan chosen for the construction of its edifice (namely, its internal constitution) was, on the part of Freemasonry, a virtual condemnation of the ideas and arrangements of the world around. The ordinances of Freemasonry did indeed make great outward display of obedience to law, of respect to the outward forms and usages of profane society, and of reverence towards rulers; at their banquets the Masons did indeed drink the health of kings in the days of monarchy, and of presidents in the times of republic; such prudent circumspection being indispensable on the part of an association which threatened the existence of the very Governments under whose eyes it was compelled to work, and whose suspicion it had already aroused. This, nevertheless, did not suffice to counteract the radically revolutionary influence continually exercised by the Craft, even while it professed nothing but peaceful intentions."<sup>1</sup>

It was precisely these terrible revolutionary designs of the Secret Society which induced its Provincial Grand Master, the Prussian Minister Count von Haugwitz, to leave it. In the memorial presented by him to the Congress of Monarchs at Verona in 1830, which has since passed through many editions, he bids the rulers of Europe to be on their guard against the "Hydra." "I feel at this moment firmly persuaded," writes the ex-Grand-Master, "that the French Revolution, which had its first commencement in 1788, and broke out soon after, attended with all the horrors of regicide, existed Heaven knows how long before, having been planned, and having had the way prepared for it, by associations and secret oaths."

As a proof that Count Haugwitz did not take too gloomy a view of things, we will proceed to quote from two official manifestoes of the Craft. We know well that such speeches, especially if delivered in the presence of great persons, overflow with affected and servile loyalty, and are worded in direct opposition to the real character of their secret transactions; but when the waves of political agitation rise high, the veil is at times somewhat incautiously lifted, and orators are apt to say what they subsequently regret. Thus after the events of February 1848, the Craft sang songs of triumph at the open success of its secret endeavours. A Belgian Brother, Van der Heym, spoke thus:—"On the day following the revolution of February a whole nation rose as one man, overturned the throne, and wrote over the frontal of the royal palace the words 'Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,' all the citizens having adopted as their own this fundamental principle of Freemasonry. The combatants had not to battle long before the victory over their oppressors was gained—that freedom won which for centuries had formed the theme of Masonic discourses. We, the Apostles of Fraternity, laid the foundation-stone of the Republic."<sup>1</sup>

Brother Peigné, Worshipful Master of the Lodge of "The People's Friends," uttered similar words about the same time:—"In our glorious Revolution of 1792 the Lodge of the Nine Sisters (Neuf Sœurs) gave to the world men such as Garat, Brissot, Bailly, Camille-Desmoulins, Condorcet, Champfort, Petion; the Lodge of the Iron-Mouth (Bouche de Fer) gave to it Fouchet, Goupil de Prefeln, Sièyes; the Lodge of Candour (De la Candeur) Custine, the two Lameths, and Lafayette. So great is the fertility of Freemasonry, that she was able to produce all these great minds, the lights of their age, without in any way exhausting her vast resources. The words inscribed on her banner, 'Liberty, Fraternity, Equality,' ensured to France intellectual supremacy, and were adopted as the national motto. . . . To us,

The Secret Society made itself very prominent as the party of Revolution, not in France alone, but also in Germany; and to it is to be ascribed the fact that the triumphant shouts of the “Mountain” on the left bank of the Rhine were “re-echoed by the noblest spirits of the Fatherland,” to use their own phraseology. Only when blood began to flow like water did the Brethren in Weimar, Gotha, Brunswick, Berlin, and other places sober down. It was at that time (1794) that the Berlin Directory of the United Templars and Rosicrucians presented to the Government their celebrated manifesto: — “Almost before we were aware of the presence amongst us of this destructive teaching, it had become the idol of a great number of our Brethren. Here we have the source whence sprang the extravagant theories as to liberty and equality which are so thoughtlessly carried into practice in our own day. Associations within associations were formed, making strange and novel use of the newly-found (?) treasure. One great sect grew up well known to all, its exertions being no more of a secret than its name.<sup>2</sup> This sect it is which has honeycombed the ground beneath our feet, and prepared our ruin. . . . We assert boldly, in the hearing of princes and peoples, that the abuse of our League has given rise to all the political and moral disorder now universally prevailing. Apostate members of our Craft have originated the revolutions of the past, and they will be the authors of those of the future." Excellent, true-hearted men! You little knew your Order, although you were, or rather because you were, its ostensible chiefs. You believed it to be a club, where you met to enjoy your wine, discuss the topics of the day, and do one another a good turn—an opinion shared in by many thousands of your deluded Brethren, even in the present day.

Some materials for the tremendous conflagration which was destined to be kindled by the initiated members of the higher grades are to be found even in the lowest grade. Amongst other questions, the Apprentice is asked on his reception—"What sort of man should be admitted to the privileges of Masonry?" The answer is, "One who is free-born." The ceremonial requires him to wear round his neck a rope—in the profane world an emblem of slavery. In order to call his attention again to the emphatic word, the question is repeated in somewhat different terms—"On what do you ground your hope of admission?" The correct answer to this is—"On my being free by upon in the present instance to bear the blame of having kindled the infernal flame of revolution. We ask them to whom is it to be ascribed in France, Italy, Spain, and Portugal?

birth."<sup>1</sup> It often occurs that the aspirants to the leathern apron are too much taken up with the jugglery that goes on at the time to pay heed to the principal word, and at a later period are quite astonished at the Democratical intrigues of the Lodge ; but that does not matter in the least. It has been said that all the children of Adam are either nine-pins, or the balls that knock them down. Those who are not the latter can be made very useful as the former, and fill excellently their place in creation. It is no good trying to give a thin skin to the Pachydermata. The following directions bear on this subject:—"In order to guard against the disclosure of the designs of our Society through dissatisfaction on the part of any member, we bind every candidate by oath to the most inviolable secrecy, and enforce it by threats of mysterious and terrible punishment ; but independently of the oath, and in addition to it, it is necessary to disguise the integral character of our teaching by means of allegories, and deal out the amount of knowledge to be imparted to each aspirant in a measure proportioned to his receptive powers. We must never admit him at random into any particular class, but only into a grade commensurate with such capabilities as he has already given satisfactory proof of possessing" ("Révélations," p. 17).

If we cast a glance at the map of the world, and pass in swift review its history since 1800, it is impossible to conceal from ourselves the fact that a large number of sovereigns have had their thrones, and even their lives, forcibly taken from them; and that in more recent days the most ancient and sacred of all thrones—that of the Holy Father—has been completely overthrown. The thing most to be deplored is to see monarchy allowing Freemasonry to use it as a tool when attacking other potentates; for the war is waged, not against any individual king, but against kings in general, and what is wanted is to establish an universal republic, in which God shall be ignored. In the blind folly of their hearts the persecutors of the Church have entered into a tacit league with Freemasonry; it affords them ready help, places public opinion at their command, supplies them with an enthusiastic band of fellow-labourers. But let them not deceive themselves, the workman will expect his wages; and for these he must wait until the last throne has fallen. We are forced to admit, with deep regret, that, unless appearances are altogether deceptive, the sun of monarchy must soon set, and the saying of Napoleon be fulfilled, that Europe would fall a prey to republicanism or to Cossack despotism.

Formerly rulers were, at least, not afraid of prohibiting that worst anomaly of political life — a Secret State within the State. In the year 1735 the States-General of Holland proscribed the Secret League, and Louis XVI. did the same in France two years later. The great Council of Berne proscribed it in 1748; Bavaria followed this example in 1799, and its total suppression took place in 1845. The Regency of Milan and the Governor of Venice issued commands to the same effect in 1814; John VI. of Portugal interdicted Freemasonry in the strictest manner in 1816. His prohibition was renewed in 1824, but did not long remain in force; at any rate, since 1845 the Craft has been greatly on the increase in that country, and has become a powerful political agent. In 1820 several Lodges were closed in Prussia on account of political intrigues; and in the same year Alexander V. banished the Order from the whole Russian Empire. A similar occurrence took place four years later in Modena and Spain. At the time of the Congress of Verona the existence of the Secret Society was menaced in almost all the states of Europe. But, after all, what has it become in our own day?—the terrible noli me tangere, which neither statesmen nor authors dare to touch.

CHAPTER VI.

THE GREAT SECRET AND THE THIRTIETH SCOTCH DEGREE (KADOSCH).<sup>1</sup>

THE designs of the Secret Society in regard to the political reorganisation of humanity have, in the last chapter, come before the reader in all their terrible reality. But the more easy-going Masons frequently allege, in apology for these hellish plans, that the Society is not responsible for them collectively, since, originating in an abuse of its rules on the part of individual members, and only appearing under circumstances of extraordinary excitement, such plots cannot be laid to the charge of the whole body. We, on the other hand, are prepared to prove that these excuses will not hold water, because the frightful seeds of democracy are secretly sown broadcast, although with the knowledge of only the select few.

When the degree of Master-Mason is about to be conferred on any candidate, the Lodge is draped with black, the hangings are strewed with deaths'-heads and tears; in the centre of the hall is placed a coffin draped with black, and raised upon five steps; the Brethren stand around with tokens of grief and revenge. The Masonic legend in explanation of this runs as follows:—Solomon, the embodiment of human wisdom, gave the plan for the erection of the Temple; Hiram, of Phœnicia, furnished the materials; Adoniram, or Hiram Abif (Abiv = his father), superintended the building, and paid their wages to the Master-Masons, Fellow-Crafts, and Apprentices. One evening, when Hiram was about to close the Temple, a Fellow-Craft demanded of him the secrets of the Master-Mason. To each of the three classes a secret password had been communicated, for the purpose of mutual recognition, which they were never to divulge; and now three of the Fellow-Crafts, determined to which has been previously given in full, is indisputable, as it was issued by the Craft, although not given to the public. In the third place, we have made use of the Little Catechism of the three lowest grades of Freemasonry ("Instructions des trois degrés symboliques écossais," Paris). We may also remark that no substantial difference occurs in the rites of Freemasonry, or in its ulterior aims; trifling variations only appearing with regard to formalities and unimportant regulations. Further information on this point may be found in Barruel, pp. 227-247. We have carefully collated the Hebrew words with the original, and corrected them accordingly, as far as the various orthographic and vocalic errors allowed us to do this.

obtain possession of the secrets of the Master's degree, conspired on the evening in question to extort it from Hiram at any cost. Upon his refusal to betray his trust, he received from the Fellow-Craft a heavy blow upon his head; he rushed to the south door, where he was accosted by a second ruffian in a similar manner; he finally staggered to the east door, where the third conspirator was posted, who, on receiving a like reply to his demand, finished his victim. The three murderers buried the corpse beneath a heap of stones, marking the place by means of a sprig of cassia. Solomon, full of concern at the loss of Hiram, sent other Masters to search for him. The body was at length found, in an advanced stage of decomposition; whereupon one of the party exclaimed, Mac-benac! that is, in the interpretation of the Craft, "The flesh is rotting from the bones;" or, more correctly, Mac-ben-akah, i.e., "The son of sorrow is falling into corruption." For fear lest Hiram might have divulged the secret word of the Masters, it was agreed to abandon it, and adopt in its place Mac-benac, which became the new word of the Masters' degree, and is still regarded by the Craft as sacred, being employed by Master-Masons only in their foolish ceremonies. The meaning of the fable is this. Every Master-Mason is entrusted with a twofold commission—First, to seek for the lost word, which he finds in the higher grades to be Jehovah, i.e., natural religion; and secondly, to revenge the death of Hiram, of which the Masters' sign is a constant memorial; this consists in a feigned stab with the thumb, the four fingers being stretched out meanwhile horizontally, at a right angle. The candidate for the Master's degree is extended on the ground, to represent the murdered man, and slowly raised up at the sound of the above-named word.<sup>1</sup> The son of sorrow (man) is falling into corruption (in the profane world); but who is to blame for this? In the thirtieth degree of Freemasonry, the most important of all, this question is clearly answered.

At first the new-made Mason is only allowed to hear the words Liberty and Equality occasionally, but when his ears have grown familiar with them, at least in the Lodge, and he has learned secresy, then he is raised to the grade of Master, and hears for the first time of a Founder, whose murder has to be revenged; the succeeding grades, especially those from the ninth to the tenth upwards, accustom him to the idea of vengeance, so that it finally becomes habitual with him. A thousand dreadful oaths pledge him to preserve the secret at any cost; and by the time he is made a Rosicrucian, provided he be fully initiated, he will have abandoned his belief in Christ, and in all revealed religion. To sum up all in a word, he will have become an out-and-out materialist. If he gives proof of possessing the needful qualifications, he may at length in the thirtieth grade receive the titles of Grand Inspecteur, Grand Elu, Knight Kadosch (or Knight of the White and Black Eagle). The official manual, the Thuilleur, states the required age for admission to be "a century and more," or that of a person "past reckoning." This fact amply proves that admission is only granted to a chosen few, who are dispensed with regard to age, whilst the rejected candidate is refused on the score of his being too young. This grade is frequently conferred on those who do not belong to the Scotch rite, as a merely honorary degree, persons whom it is considered advisable to dupe being admitted to it. It is divided into about six subdivisions, expressed with more or less intentional vagueness according to the end to be served. The grade, as adopted by most of the French Lodges, is very much softened down. In other words, many are received into this grade as an honorary distinction, and with a merely nominal admission, without being really initiated into it.

The word "Kadosch" means holy, sanctified, purified. However, let no man on this account entertain the idea that Knights of the Black and White Eagle aspire to peculiar sanctity; the word is only intended to express that they are the elect, the privileged ones, who have been purified from every taint of prejudice. This grade is the ne plus ultra of the Scotch rite, the three following ones being merely honorary, intended for exalted personages, and being quite separated from the general machinery of the Order.

The ceremonies attending admission into the eighth grade are terrific, and read like a preparation for the scaffold. Barruel writes concerning them (p. 219), "Several Masons initiated into the mysteries of the grade in question have informed me that no natural or artificial horrors are left unemployed to test the fortitude of the aspirant. Montjoie mentions a ladder, which the Duke of Orleans had to ascend, in order to cast himself headlong from the summit. But that is not all. Let the reader imagine an underground structure, from which a species of narrow tower leads up into the Lodge. The candidate is conducted to the bottom of this pit, through all sorts of chambers, where everything is calculated to inspire dread. Arrived below, he is locked in, bound and throttled. Left alone in this condition, he presently feels himself raised up by means of machinery, with sounds which strike terror to the heart. Suspended midway in this gloomy shaft, he rises slowly, the process sometimes occupying several hours, only to fall again, as if the lift had given way; and he is compelled thus alternately to rise and fall, enduring the repetition of these horrors without uttering a cry, or evincing the least sign of fear. Freemasons have assured me that it was impossible to give an accurate description of these ordeals, for the head grew dizzy at the bare remembrance of them, and indeed at the time it was found indispensable to administer strengthening draughts to the unfortunate sufferer, to keep up his physical forces at least, although it was impossible to prevent the brain from reeling. Besides this chamber of horrors, four apartments are necessary for the ceremony of the reception of a Kadosch. The first is hung with black, a lamp within a triangle is suspended over a trapdoor, casting its light on a flight of steps leading down into a cellar, into which the candidate is cast. There he finds a coffin, and deciphers the inscription, 'The man who can overcome the terrors of death, shall arise from the bosom of the earth, and claim to be initiated into the great secrets.' The second apartment is hung with white; in the foreground are two urns, one filled with burning incense, the other with flaming spirits of wine, which latter lights up the chamber into which only the high-priest may enter. The third apartment is hung with blue, the canopy being bespangled with stars, and the whole lighted up by three yellow wax tapers. The hangings of the fourth are red and white columns: in the east stands a throne, and above it a crowned two-headed eagle, holding a dagger in its talons, and wearing round its neck a black ribband, to which a triple cross is suspended; on its breast is a triangle containing the words, Nec proditor, nec proditur, innocens fovet. (Neither betraying nor betrayed, in innocence he cherishes)—probably, his designs. From the wings of the eagle hang down draperies of black and white velvet strewn with red crosses, and forming a tent. Behind the throne are two banners crossed; one white, with a green cross bearing the inscription, 'God wills it ;' the other black, with on one side a red cross, on the reverse a double eagle holding a dagger, accompanied by the words, 'Conquer or die!' A double ladder is also placed in this apartment."

Only the most childish simplicity can regard these preparations, which we transcribe exactly as they are given in the Thuilleur, as nothing more than a meaningless pageant, a much ado about nothing ; indeed, such persistent blindness could not be otherwise than culpable. What an outcry there would be if but a fourth part of these heraldic emblems and strange devices boding murder and destruction were to be found within a convent ! What Religious Order demands of its subjects such blind obedience at all risks ?

If the candidate has stood the ordeals intended to test his implicit obedience and absolute secrecy, and has proved his readiness, if need be, to persist in them until death, the mask is completely thrown aside. It is no longer Adoniram or Hiram whose death cries for vengeance ; the three Fellow-Craftsmen are not the real traitors against whom implacable hatred has been sworn. The two great institutions of the Christian world now stand out in terribly bold relief as the objects to be pursued and annihilated by the deadly hatred of the Craft, in order to inaugurate the return of the pretended Golden Age of Liberty and Equality, when man, long mouldering alive in the grave, shall be quickened as on the Easter morn of the Resurrection, and clothed once more in full dignity and glory. Let us listen to the Thuilleur, which, though it tells us little, speaks in no ambiguous terms.

“The grade of Kadosch commemorates the suppression of the Order of Templars by Pope Clement V. and Philip the Fair, together with the murder of the Grand Commander Jacques Molay, who was burnt alive on March 11, 1314. On the final initiation of an Adept, the scene changes; there is no more talk of Hiram and his tragic end. For this allegorical personage is substituted Jacobus Burgundus Molay, whose death the Adept is to revenge, either figuratively on the authors of the crime, or implicitly on those who now deserve a like fate (sur qui de droit).”

In that part of the Catechism of Freemasonry which refers to a Knight Kadosch, we find the following questions and answers:—“Q. At what hour was the Lodge opened?—A. At nightfall. Q. Whom do you recognise?—A. Two persons worthy of abhorrence. Q. Name them?—A. Philip the Fair and Bertrand de Goth (sic) Clement V.” (evidently Bertrand d’Agoust, Archbishop of Orleans, afterwards Pope Clement V.)

We cannot fail to perceive that Clement V. and Philip the Fair—both directly or indirectly concerned in the death of the Grand Commander Jacques Molay, and now long since dead—cannot in reality be the personages indicated as the object of the sinister vengeance of the League; but they stand for those who, in the present day, are vested with the chief ecclesiastical and secular dignity, and consequently for all their adherents, whether called Jesuits or Ultramontanes, Legalists or Reactionaries: all natural foes of the Craft. What clear light this throws upon the shameful conduct of the Duke of Orleans towards his royal cousin Louis XVI., and upon the proceedings of Mazzini and Garibaldi! How amply it explains many of the sad events in recent times and in our own day!

According to the Thuilleur, the thirtieth grade has two subdivisions or points, that of the Knights of the Black Eagle and that of the White, or Kadosch. The passwords or signs of both these grades serve to confirm what we have already said; at the same time, we must call the reader's attention to the fact that the Thuilleur—since some words might prove dangerous, as hinting too plainly at bloody vengeance—adds another rendering (preceded by the word écrites) which alters the meaning of the first, or mitigates its force, giving to it, at any rate, a false construction.

The password of a Knight of the Black Eagle, Menachem (comforter): Answer, Nechemiah (greater consolation). Or sometimes Nika (Niccah, he slaughters), Maka (Maccah, massacre), to be written Nekam (he revenges), Makah (probably Maccah, as above).

WORDS PECULIAR TO KNIGHTS OF THE WHITE
EAGLE, OR KADOSCH.

“ At the reception of a Kadosch, a mystic ladder comes into play, which the neophyte is required to ascend and descend. The ladder is symbolic ; each round represents some virtue (?). Of these we will give the several names, with their corrected meaning.

1st Round—Tesla Cades (probably Thisleh Kadesch, i.e., Thou shalt be silent, accursed one !) Write Tsedakah (Zedakah, justice).

2d Round—Charlaban (the white is burning, either a reference to the dazzling whiteness of Molay’s presumed innocence, or intended to convey a threat against the Pope, who is clad in white). Write, Schor Laban (albus bos = the white ox), a metaphorical expression for candour (!).

5th Round—Choemul Seal (ghemul scheal, schaal—Retribution demands it). Write, Hamal saghia (labor magnus ; more probably Hamal seghiah, a false and wearisome road) paraphrased in the following words, Progress in virtue (!).

6th Round—Sabaël (if this spelling be correct, this word is a blasphemy with which we will not disgrace our pages ; if written Zeba El, it signifies a Band of Warriors, or the Hosts of the Lord). Write, Sabbal (onus), betokening Patience (!).

The Shafts of the Column—On the north side, Oseb Eloah (he who apostatises from the highest). Write, Oheb Eloah (Deum amans, He who loves the highest), love of one's neighbour.<sup>1</sup> On the south side, Oseb Scherabal (Oseb sar abel, i.e., he who falls away from the Prince of Misery). Write, Oheb Kerobo (Propinquum ei amans, Brotherly love). Properly Oheb Rerobo, i.e., a Friend to his neighbour.<sup>2</sup>

The sacred word is Nekom Adonai (the revenge of the Lord); this word is common to the Knights Kadosch of every land, whether Sweden, Germany, Prussia, England, or France.

Password on Entrance—Nekom (to revenge). Answer, Menakem (revenger.) On going out, Phaal Col. Answer, Pharas Col. These two mottoes are likewise incorrectly interpreted by the Thuileur as meaning operatum est omne, explicatum est omne—i.e., All is done, all is explained. They signify rather, He does everything, he destroys everything.

<sup>1</sup> According to the opinions of Freemasonry, to be developed later on, man has taken the place of God.

<sup>2</sup> The names of the Pillars were probably intended to form a phrase. If this supposition be a right one, the northern one would signify, He who forsakes the Highest loves him who is really highest—i.e. man; and the southern pillar, He who forsakes the promise of misery is a true friend to his fellow-men.

The working-hours of this grade are from nightfall—i.e., nine hours after noon—until daybreak. In the vestments of a Kadosch we constantly meet with the eagle holding a poniard in his talons, the motto "Conquer or die," the crossed swords, the sash of crimson and gold with a dagger, or the dagger attached to a riband and purple rosette.

These hieroglyphics, transcribed literally from the official manual, have intentionally been given at length, and we leave the reader to draw his own inference from them. Barruel had not access to this source, but from other writings, and from personal intercourse with Masons of the higher grades, he was led to form for himself this conclusion, namely, that "the grade of Kadosch is the soul of Freemasonry, and the final object of its plots is the reintroduction of absolute Liberty and Equality through the destruction of all royalty, and the abrogation of all religious worship" (p. 222). He tells us, moreover, that when a friend of his boasted of being, as a Rosicrucian, in possession of the entire secret of Freemasonry, he drew the man's attention to the fact that, in spite of having reached that exalted grade, he was far from having attained the highest point, proving this by laying before him the hieroglyphics of the Craft, and thereby forcing from him the confession that he was ignorant of their meaning, and had asked in vain to be made acquainted with it, but believed them to be of much the same nature as the Square, the Trowel, &c. "I know," Barruel proceeds to say, "that my friend had only to take one step more in order to see his mistake, and I therefore gave him the instructions necessary for reaching that grade, in which all attempts at deception are once and for ever abandoned, and no self-delusion is possible as to the ulterior object of the grades which are still more advanced. He himself was far too anxious for thorough enlightenment not to employ at once the means I pointed out to him, especially as he wished to dispel my supposed prejudices against the higher grades. A few days later he entered my room in a state of which his own words will give the best idea. 'O my dear friend!' he exclaimed, 'what you said was indeed true—only too true. What was I thinking of? Good heavens! what was I thinking of?' He could say no more, but kept on reiterating his former exclamation, 'What you said was indeed true; but do not press me further, that is all that I can tell you.' . . . 'O my poor friend!' I replied, 'it is I who ought to beg your pardon; you have just bound yourself by a terrible oath, and I am really to blame for it. But I assure you, when I advised you as I did, I forgot all about the oath, or I should have spoken differently.' . . . That man had lost all his fortune in the Revolution, and he admitted to me that full compensation had been offered to him, but only on certain terms. 'If I consent,' he said, 'to go to London, Brussels, Constantinople, or any other town I please, my own wants, and those of my wife and children, will be amply provided for.' 'Well and good,' I remarked, 'but probably under the express stipulation that you preach Liberty, Equality, and red-hot revolution.' 'Exactly so,' he answered, 'but that is all I dare tell you. Good heavens! what was I thinking of? For goodness' sake, ask me no more questions!' 'That was quite enough for me,'" says Barruel in conclusion: and he evidently remained firmly persuaded that in their secret heart many members of the higher grades detest bitterly the occult designs to which, in spite of their good intentions, they have fallen victims, and would be even more willing than was his friend in question to disclose them, if the solemn obligation laid upon them did not render their doing so a matter of serious risk to themselves.

The fanatical advocate of Freemasonry and of the rights of man, Condorcet, so notorious at the time of the French Revolution, lays down very fully in his chief work, "Esquisse des Progrès," &c. (especially époque 7 and 8), the principles with which a Kadosch is supposed to be imbued. He endeavours to make his readers see how grateful they ought to be to the ancient secret societies, especially towards the Order of Templars, "whose peaceful and inoffensive mission it was to preserve intact in a small circle of initiated a few primitive truths to serve as a sure antidote to the dominant prejudices of the day." In the terrible revolution he beholds the long-prepared and long-looked-for triumph of the Secret Society; the death of Molay he regards as a brutal act of barbarism. According to his ideas, the members of the Craft may be compared to sages "standing by, full of virtuous indignation at the sight of suffering nations, the very sanctuary of whose conscience is not safe from the oppression of kings; of kings, too, who are themselves the superstitious slaves or political tools of an encroaching priesthood. . . . . These Secret Societies are composed of noble-minded men, who make bold to investigate the foundation on which power and authority rest; who unveil to the people the important truth that freedom is their inalienable inheritance; that there exists in favour of tyranny (i.e., royalty) no prescriptive title, no contract whereby a nation is irrevocably bound to any one family; that those placed in authority, whatever their function or jurisdiction, are the official servants, not the governors of the people; that the nation must ever retain in its own hands the right of withdrawing the authority it alone has conferred, should abuse be made of it, or should it be no longer found conducive to the public interests; in a word, that with the nation rests the power to depose or punish its appointed officials." The mind of the Kadosch may be still more plainly gathered from the wild appeals to the swords of the Brethren made by Bonneville ("Esprit des Religions," p. 156 seq.) "Traverse with one bound the centuries of the past, incite the nations to pursue Philip the Fair (i.e. kings) with their vengeance! All of you, whether Templars or no, help a free people to build in three days an immortal temple to Truth! Down with the tyrants! Earth must be freed from them!"<sup>1</sup>

However often we may be assured that the ritual of the thirtieth grade, as practised at present in France and elsewhere, has been greatly softened down,—i.e., that there is no longer any question of bloodshed,<sup>2</sup>—we find it nevertheless impossible to abandon our opinion that the real and essential character of the secret teaching remains unaltered, and that the best we can hope for is, that humanity may be spared a repetition of such sanguinary spectacles as the death of Louis XVI. But besides the material act, there is, so to speak, a moral decapitation possible for kings and priests, if religion be trodden down into the mire, and hereditary monarchs either chased from their own dominions, or made the slaves of an imperial convention, the decrees of which they must perforce obey, if the continuance of their own existence is to be a thing possible.<sup>3</sup>

mechanism, Freemasonry found in 'princes and aristocrats patrons rather than enemies. Even monarchs, as for instance Frederic II. of Prussia, have condescended to handle the trowel and tie on the apron. And why not? As the existence of the higher grades was carefully concealed from them, they only knew as much of Freemasonry as could be revealed to them without danger."—"Lettres à un Franc-maçon, extraites du Bien Public," Brussels, 1855, p. 74. Also "La Franc-maçonnerie dans l'Etât," p. 37.

CHAPTER VII.

THE WAR CARRIED ON BY FREEMASONRY AGAINST SOCIETY.

THE project of a future and universal Red Republic lies at the heart of Freemasonry, it is its legitimate offspring, not a bastard child sprung from the heated brains of a few individuals, who have misapplied the rules of their Craft, rules pretending to be of the most lamblike innocence. If the worthy Brothers forming the Party of the Blues do not see things as we do, they have only themselves to blame.

The deductions of logic and the experience of history combine to teach us that political radicalism infallibly leads to socialism; nor does Freemasonry tell a different tale. A democratic republic is its ideal, and the socialist agitation of our own day is from beginning to end a fruit out of its garden, a weapon out of its armoury. We will now bring forward the principles, the ceremonies, the utterances, and the proceedings of the Craft, in order to establish the truth of this proposition.

1. If we examine the fundamental principles of Freemasonry, we shall find socialism, and to a certain extent communism, are both secretly and openly taught, and proclaimed to be the normal and legitimate condition of society, in comparison with which the existing social order is an abuse of power, and a fruit of rapacious violence. Liberty is the first idol worshipped by the Craft, but this liberty can never be anything more than a dream so long as differences of rank, and the bulwarks that support them,—that is, the property of individuals—remain intact. Although the inhabitants of a State may be represented a thousand times over as possessed of equal rights in the eyes of the law, the projects of emancipators will always prove illusory, so long as the few are rich and the many poor. Those who adopt as their motto the word “Freedom,” in the naturalistic sense in which it is used by the Craft, must, if they would be consistent, regard inequalities of rank and social position, especially those of property, with as much abhorrence as they would a hostile garrison in the heart of their own country. A long series of initiated Masons had, in 1790, already discovered this; we mean the Society of Equals of the Pantheon, led by Babeuf, Darthe, and Sylvan Marechal, the two former of these chiefs being called upon to show their fidelity to their principles by suffering the penalty of the guillotine (1796). Therefore Freemasonry recognises no diversities of rank, or, to use its own words, “the design of the League is to reunite that which social convulsions have severed.” It desires to remove the inequalities of rank as one of the “original causes of the grievous and innumerable evils which afflict mankind." The abolition of royalty, of the aristocracy, of the priesthood, and of every form of worship, are only the first steps on the path of this psuedo-freedom. If, as another primary condition of his personal emancipation, man be required further to cast off the fear of God—if he be viewed in the light of a citizen of this world alone, he has every right to claim his share in the common Mother, and poverty thus becomes a disgraceful bondage, and the wealth of the "upper ten thousand" a glaring injustice. The second idol of the League is Equality, likewise understood in a purely naturalistic sense, not merely equal participation in rights and duties, but also in the enjoyments of life, as those are bound to admit whose highest officials lay down maxims such as the following:—"Freemasonry regards all mankind as creatures of the same race, citizens of the same world, proprietors of the same earth, children of the same Mother." The principles of Christianity teach us that riches, if lawfully acquired, may be rightfully retained, nobody having a better right to contest their possession than that of any other gifts and superiorities, mental or physical; only they lay upon their proprietor the obligation of a more large-hearted benevolence towards his needy fellow-creatures. Very different are the views of the true Mason. He regards the possession of riches as nothing more nor less than criminal covetousness; for ought not the good things of the world to be common to all?

Let us give their own words—"It is for Equality to produce that delightful peace and mutual confidence which is so intensely to be desired, but at the same time so utterly incompatible with avarice; for does it not tend to paralyse its rapacious efforts, and restore to man the common use of all those good things, the possession of which is a source of so much anxiety, and their loss the cause of so much grief?" Even the inequality arising from difference of intellectual endowments is objected to, and the following proposition laid down:—"In earlier times the absurd opinion prevailed that the intellectual superiority and greater mental acuteness of a portion of mankind entitled them to claim a tribute of esteem and veneration at the hands of other and inferior men. But the fact that his fellow-man is more gifted than himself cannot justify any one in an act of idolatry. The jealous God who created man will allow no one to usurp a share of the worship due to Himself, and He rejects as impure the incense of adoration offered to Him if the least grain finds its way to the altar of a frail and perishable idol, utterly unworthy of so exalted a tribute. In a word, to recognise in a fellow-man anything more than an equal is a degradation of human nature, a violation of human rights, a trampling upon the dignity of mankind" ("Révelations," pp. 11, 12). Thus what is wanted is a complete levelling of mankind: we are to have no more varieties of rank, of rich and poor, of learned or unlearned. The coward and the hero, the king and the beggar, the fool and the philosopher, the saint and the sinner,—all are equal, and it is an act of profanity to pay more respect to the one than to the other! Those who work in the same shop must all enjoy the same position, and receive the same wages; the most skilled artisan does not deserve a single word more praise nor a morsel more bread than any of the others. This last principle has already made its way down to the lowest strata of society; for instance, the Paris ouvrier watches with Argus' eyes lest any inequality of wages should creep in, lest a more skilful hand receive a sou over and above the earnings dealt out to his slovenly and ignorant comrade; and this state of things is justly deplored as boding the imminent ruin of real and useful industry. What would become of virtue, of scientific research, of all that ennobles man, if this Liberty and Equality were transferred from the dark recesses of the gloomy Lodges into the broad daylight of the market-place, and the glare of the crowded thoroughfare? If this our condemnation be thought somewhat too severe; if it be objected that the maxims we have been discussing may be, after all, the ravings of a few misguided Brethren, for which they alone should be held responsible, we answer that Liberty and Equality, as they are understood by Freemasonry in the sense just explained, are the sacred Palladium of the Association; they constitute its very soul and spirit. But our assertions rest upon more convincing proofs than any brought forward as yet, and we now proceed to examine—

2. The ritual common to the Craft. Every accepted candidate is called a "Brother," and treated as such, his position in the "profane" world being no longer recognised.

"We men are all Brethren, all kinsfolk are we,
We know no distinctions of rank or degree ;
And the Brother adorned with riband and lace Owns as Sister the maiden of lowliest race."

This Brotherhood is not merely an image of the friendship supposed to prevail amongst members of the Craft (a friendship well known not to be of a very ardent description), or of the equality of rights to which they are admitted. It is also an appropriate expression of social equality, as it can only exist amongst the members of a family, and of the equal claim possessed by all men to enjoy the pleasures of this life and the produce of the earth. Practised, in the first instance, within the Lodge, of which the four walls represent the four quarters of the globe, its true aim is to reform and regenerate the whole world. Some may perhaps allege as an objection that the various grades of Apprentice, Fellow-Craft, and Master-Mason betoken disparity of rank. This is not so; these only show a difference in the degree of initiation in the exoteric teaching, and correspond to differences of age in the outside world. The Apprentice is the "Brother" of the Master; he sits at the same table with him, and partakes of the so-called love-feast, whilst passing, perhaps unconsciously, through his noviciate in the Order of Democracy.

Every Freemason wears an apron, square, &c.—in short, the implements of his Craft—for only fellow-workers can be Fellow-Craftsmen. Social democracy has adopted the Scripture maxim, “He that will not work, neither let him eat.” The apron, as a token of obligatory labour, is met with in every grade; even the “Sovereign Prince of the Royal Secret,” in the thirty-second Scotch grade has his apron of white, doubled and decorated with crimson. Thus the world is to become one great city of workmen: this cherished idea of the “International” apparently comes from the same source as that association itself.

<sup>1</sup> To these ceremonies the questions addressed to the Apprentice refer:—“Q. How were you prepared for admission?—A. I was neither naked nor clothed, I was deprived of all metal, a cable-tow put round my neck, and thus I was conducted to the temple.”—V. Instructions des trois degrés, p. 8.

“Q. Why had you to appear neither naked nor clothed?—A. In order to intimate to me that splendid apparel dazzles the populace, but the truly virtuous man rises above such vulgar prejudices.

Q. Why were you deprived of all metal?—A. Because money is an emblem of vice, and the true Mason should possess nothing of his own.”<sup>1</sup> What more could any one want to prove beyond a doubt that Freemasons esteem the possession of personal property as being no better than theft?

When one of the softer sex appears in the Lodge, she is greeted by all Masons as their Sister. We will not inquire whether this universal sisterhood could be tolerable to any modest woman in a purely naturalistic bond such as this; but the fact remains that Lodges for women have existed for years, and that their members are treated as Sisters in the Lodges of men.

<sup>1</sup> These instructions were considered too outspoken for later times, especially after the failure of Babeuf's attempt. Thus, we find a different version given in the “Instructions,” p. 13, which affords an amusing specimen of the mummery practised in the Lodge:—“Q. Why were you deprived of all metal?—A. Because on the building of the Temple at Jerusalem no sound was heard of axe, hammer, or other metal tool. Q. What was the reason of this?—A. In order that the sanctity of the temple might not be polluted. Q. How was it possible to complete that structure without the aid of such implements?—A. The materials were prepared in the forest of Lebanon, conveyed on carriages, and set up by means of mauls prepared for the purpose. Q. Why were you slipshod?—A. Because the place of my admission was holy ground, of which God said to Moses, ‘Put off the shoes from thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground.’” In this version the gist of the whole lies in the answer given in italics; the rest is all by-play. He who has a true vocation apprehends its real meaning; the well-meaning simpleton, duly impressed with the sacred character of the Lodge, looks no lower than the surface.

Let the reader reflect on what would be the probable effect on the institution of marriage of a consistent carrying out of this idea of Sisterhood. Can there be any doubt that the decree issued by the Paris Commune of incendiary memory, abolishing wedlock and authorising free love, originated in these laws of licence? And the dissolution of family ties, known to be the avowed object of the efforts of Socialism in the present day, is not this, too, the final development of a long-laid scheme? If so, we need not wonder when we hear children claimed as being the property of the State, nor will it surprise us to find, on occasion of the laws regulating school inspection passing through the Berlin Parliament in 1872, how certain journals asserted, with brazen effrontery, that school supervision belongs exclusively to the State, without being at the pains to support this axiom by any proofs.

In the following questions and answers we meet in the Apprentice degree with the same idea as to the equal right of all men to the enjoyments of the earth:—Q. Where is the Senior Warden placed?—A. In the west. Q. Why so?—A. As the sun sets in the west, so the Senior Warden is placed there to close the Lodge, to pay the workmen their hire, and dismiss them to their homes with feelings of content and satisfaction" ("Instructions," p. 5). And at the close of the Lodge the question addressed by the Worshipful Master to the above-named dignitary has a similar import:—Q. My Brother, are the workmen content?" The answer runs thus:—"They declare it at both of the pillars, Worshipful Master." A similar idea breathes in other clauses of the same chapter:—"Q. Why does the Junior Warden represent Beauty?—A. Because he is placed in the south, where the sun reaches its meridian, in order to call the Brethren from labour to refreshment, and from refreshment to labour, and to give glory and honour to the Worshipful Master (who represents the sun)." These hints are of course veiled in flowery disguise, as is invariably the case in the lower grades; and indeed this circumspection cannot be safely dispensed with even in regard to actual Members, since, on their admission, they are unable to cast off all at once the prejudices they bring with them from the "profane" world. Moreover, any premature disclosures would serve to keep at a distance members of the wealthy and influential classes, for whose sake concealment has been judged especially desirable. In spite of all caution, nevertheless, it appears that many get an inkling of what goes on behind the scenes. Whilst the petty tradesman is in hot haste to enter himself as a candidate, the merchant prince, whose fortune is made, seeks an opportunity of withdrawing from the Brotherhood, or, if his prospects seem from the first to be good, deems it his most prudent course not to enter it at all. It is of still more moment not to let the slightest whisper of their designs upon the Government get wind—above all, in districts where the new schemes of universal prosperity and happiness for mankind are likely to meet with considerable opposition. In this case the Craft resorts to its old expedient of making scapegoats of others, and, by skilfully taking the aggressive, contrives to spare itself the wearisome and perhaps impossible task of successfully standing on the defensive. And since it seemed too daring a thing, immediately after the Franco-German War, to tell the Liberal despots in Germany that the ascendancy of the International was to be imputed to the follies they had committed, a ready alternative was found in accusing the Ultramontane of a secret understanding with that League; black as well as red Internationals were spoken of. And yet no one was more thoroughly convinced of the radical falsity of this accusation than Freemasons themselves; the Brethren of Italy, France, and Belgium especially, appeared more in their true colours. In the last-named country they appeared as Atheists and Radicals of the most extreme description, and the dregs of the populace, tools ready to their hands in making any disturbance, showed plainly what their views were in regard to our various social institutions.

3. Our proofs of the warfare waged in secret by Freemasonry against Society are, in the third place, taken from the declarations of some of its leaders and principal orators. Its own especial moralist, Brother Helvetius, as early as 1758, in his work entitled "Sur l'Esprit," preached what were essentially the doctrines of Socialism, though he was careful to restrict equality to the realm of intellect. The following is a brief abstract of his propositions:—"As in the material world everything depends on the faculty of perception, there exists no original difference between mind and mind; all capacity, all talent, the moral character of individuals and of nations, depends purely upon chance circumstances, on their opportunities of receiving impressions, on their education and form of government. If any mental incapacity at all exists, it arises from the fact that all are not equally disposed to receive impressions." The conclusion is simple. If all minds—i.e., men—are equally noble and equally good, if they all possess the same capacities and desires for enjoyment, it follows that the good things of the earth ought to be equally portioned out to all, in order that the equality of mankind may be practically proved.

The theory of Fourier, the well-known Communist and Freemason, asserted the possibility of effecting an equal distribution of property without resorting to violence, by proposing to provide common dwellings, called "Phalansteries," calculated to accommodate a fixed number of persons. De Lamartine, in reference to this idea, remarks most justly (v. "Histoire de la Révolution de 1848," i. 7):—"Fourierism is a mere day-dream; community of goods, which he would introduce by means of his 'Phalansteries' (a kind of industrial and agricultural cloister), presupposes angels for their tenants, gods for their directors, mysteries for their daily bread." Modern Freemasonry, on the contrary, aims at nothing short of a complete transformation of society, as was proved by the doings of the Paris Commune in May 1871. As far back as the year 1508, a Masonic Professor at the Liberal University of Brussels expressed himself thus:—"When the Reformation and the French Revolution have borne their full fruits, by striking off the fetters which shackle society, and by developing the individuality of each one of its members, then it will be time to set about the reconstruction of society on a new plan" (Bien Public de Gaud, May 14, 1858).

Not a few similar voices, precursors of the International, made themselves heard about the same time. A New York paper, Le Libertaine, in the interests of Freemasonry, published the following declaration:—"The libertaine (one who enjoys absolute personal freedom) knows no country but that which is common to all. He is a sworn foe to restraints of every kind: he hates the boundaries of countries (international); he hates the boundaries of fields, houses, workshops (behold the end of all private property); he hates the boundaries of family (marriage is to be done away with). In his eyes the whole human race forms one vast corporation, each member of which has one and the same right to full emancipation and perfect development, whichever the hemisphere they inhabit, whatever the race whence they spring, whichever the sex to which they belong. . . . As far as religion is concerned, the libertaine has none at all; he protests against every creed; he is an Atheist and Materialist, openly denying the existence of God and of the soul. He believes, however, in boundless Unity (the Universal Substance of Pantheism), and in perpetual Progress; and as this Unity, either in the individual or in the mass, is not possible as long as matter continues the slave of mind, and mind the tyrant of matter, so progress is not capable of indefinite perfection as long as it remains hampered by any of those barriers on which the murderers of their kind have scrawled the name of God in characters of blood."<sup>1</sup> The notorious Eugène Sue was not far wrong in saying, as he did as early as the year 1845, that "Freemasonry is in the van of the Liberal-democratic party."<sup>2</sup>

Every person of any intelligence has by this time become aware that these socialistic schemes have their root in the very centre of Freemasonry, and that all its boasting about philanthropy and benevolence tends in the direction of democracy. Our readers may be interested in hearing the following testimony from the lips of an orator of the Lodge at Rouen:—"If we wish for a clear and concise definition of the real aim of Freemasonry, let us not endeavour to find it in popular opinion; it must be sought for in our own institutions. We see the Craft put tools into the hands of its members, calling on them to reconstruct a temple which was the prototype of perfection. Freemasonry belongs to the socialistic school; the defective condition of society creates the necessity for its existence; it believes reform to be possible, otherwise the mission it has undertaken would be a hopeless one. . . . Freemasonry has heard the groans of the sufferers who are trodden down by a defective social order of things, and whose cause a celebrated philosopher advocates in saying these words—'All things in this world are not as they ought to be.' . . . Freemasonry believes in progress; it calls loudly for reform, that reform whose final object has been eloquently expressed by the same author as follows—'Would you hear what your mission is? I will tell you; it is a vast one—to unite all men in one great cosmopolitan family.'"<sup>1</sup> The designs given here in rough draft have, since 1864, been worked out by the International with terrible minuteness, and recent times have proved this sect itself to be the offspring of Freemasonry (Laacher Stimmen, 1872, No. 2).

We have already remarked that a complete convulsion of our social organisation is contemplated by those who have been really initiated into the higher grades. This is admitted by a member of the Lodge at Metz. "Freemasonry is socialistic in the highest degree; it has outrun the disciples of Fourier in organising a new order of things. We must not imagine that these socialistic ideas are nowadays only beginning to strike root in our temples; they have thriven there ever since the time when the first-fruits of Liberalism appeared. If you would convince yourselves of this, look through the higher grades, and you will find that in them man is led up by gradual steps to those advanced views which have only been embraced by a few select spirits. As an example" (of these advanced views): "moral and religious errors, and above all the fatal belief in the natural depravity of man, have been the cause of almost all human failings. The nature of man is good, his surroundings alone are evil. . . . The disciple of Fourier must feel that the time has come for him to betake himself to our temple, where to his surprise he will find himself as much at home as if it were a dwelling prepared expressly for him. He may perhaps gaze with tender emotion on the spot where the first cradle of his infancy stands. We would tell him that subjection to maternal authority" (i.e., the Craft) "is an admirable preparation for achieving future success, and one of the best tests of his own readiness to sacrifice himself for mankind. The Grand Orient has long since unrolled the plan of operations for the coming social agitation; let each individual Brother study it in detail, and act in accordance with the impulses imparted to him."

But it may be objected that all our evidence is taken from the Lodges of France and Belgium, in which countries Radicalism is known to be rampant. It may therefore be well to turn our attention to Germany, where similar testimony is not lacking.

The following extracts are taken from the Latomia, an organ of the Craft (vol. xii. p. 237):—"Communists point out to us two axioms on which the whole theory of Communism rests; axioms which, if apprehended correctly, and carried out in moderation, cannot be regarded otherwise than as incontrovertibly true. First and foremost are the principles establishing the equality of all men in the eternal order of things, and in the second place those liberal views which would make the few subordinate to the many, private and individual interests subservient to the general good. It is impossible to do otherwise than welcome Socialism as being a valuable ally of Freemasonry in its work of ennobling mankind, a fellow-helper in its efforts to promote their welfare. For Freemasons cannot refuse to acknowledge that Socialism practically treats the above-mentioned principles, in so far as they aim at promoting the happiness of the human race, in a less extreme manner than Communism—indeed, in much the same way as their own Order does. Moreover, need we do more than glance at the fact that from the legend of Solomon's material temple the first idea of our spiritual structure was derived—need we do more than observe the sign of recognition exchanged between Apprentices, in order to convince ourselves of the close affinity existing between the rules of our Royal Craft and the principle that the work of every man should be proportioned to his capacity, and the wages he receives to the amount he has performed. Thus Socialism, Freemasonry, and Communism have, after all, a common origin."<sup>1</sup> Although this explanation is most carefully worded, and the bitter pill of socialistic theories is sugared over to deceive the palate of the well-to-do citizen belonging to the lower grades, it fully recognises nevertheless, the kinship existing between Socialism and Freemasonry—an admission made with evident reluctance, but which is of infinite value to ourselves.

In the annual for Freemasons published by Bechstein (1849, p. 270), we read as follows:—"The nature of the intercourse between nations, and their mutual relations to one another, must be dependent on the practical realisation of the fact that all men are brethren, that all mankind constitute but one great family. All strive after happiness; every man has a right to enjoy life, but in the exercise of this right he is sadly straightened by the stress of existing circumstances."

4. The action of Freemasonry is in strict harmony with those flowers of rhetoric of which we have just presented our readers with a small selection. Somewhere between 1840-50, Eugène Sue published his infamous "Mystères de Paris," a work intended solely to spread moral corruption, and intensify the class-hatred with which the lower orders regarded the upper strata of society. The enormous sale of this work was not due to its literary worth, but to the efforts of the 40,000 Brethren which the Grand Orient could boast of possessing on the banks of the Seine; and its design of stirring up the mud at the bottom of the river was completely fulfilled before many years had elapsed. In May 1847, when the crop of revolution was already in the ear, and ripening for the sickle of the Reds, a Congress of European Freemasons was held at Strasbourg, at which the leaders of the Socialist party, Caussidière, Rollin, Blanc, Proudhon, Pyat, and others, were present in their character of Members of the Craft.<sup>1</sup> That the so-called work then accomplished was not merely political, but also socialistic in its tendency, is abundantly proved, as well by the sentiments of those who were present as by the colouring imparted to the revolution which broke out nine months later, i.e., in February 1848. The excited workmen of Paris set the ball rolling with their horny hands; the timid bourgeoisie, as represented by the National Guard, assented to it with throbbing hearts; and when success crowned the work, the Craft did not dare, of course, to withhold its homage. The Grand Orient hastened to burn incense before the idols recently set up, and the speech delivered by the head of the deputation was unmistakably socialistic. We will give the account of it which appeared in the Univers of that date (1848, No. 449):—"Paris, May 8, 1848. A deputation of

<sup>1</sup> We owe this information to Eckert, whose labours have been of so much service to us; he states that it was obtained from a most reliable source in Berlin, which he was prepared to name, if necessary.—Cf. Laacher Stimmen.

Freemasons, belonging to the Grand Orient of France, wearing their insignia, waited on the Provisionary Government, in order to present an address giving in their adhesion to the Republic. This deputation was received by MM. Cremieux, Garnier-Pagès, and Secretary-General Pagnerre, who also wore the insignia of the Craft. M. Bertrand, as the representative of the Grand Master, began his speech with these words:—‘All glory to the Supreme Architect of the Universe. The Orient of France to the Provisionary Government. Although the Freemasons of France are by the constitutions of their Order removed far from the sphere of any political disturbance and crisis (!), they cannot forbear to express the pleasurable feelings with which they regard the social changes of recent occurrence. The words Liberty, Equality, ✓ Fraternity, have ever been inscribed on the banner of Freemasons; and now that they read the same motto on the national standard of France, they welcome the triumph of their principles, and joyfully congratulate you on having been the means of extending the privileges of Freemasonry to the whole country.<sup>1</sup> Forty thousand Freemasons, divided into five hundred Lodges, promise you their help.’ The answer of the Minister Cremieux, himself a Mason, is of a very similar description:—“The great Architect has given to the world the sun to enlighten it and liberty to uphold it ; it is His will that all men should be free. He has given them the earth as their portion, that they may make it bear fruit. . . . From the first, Freemasonry has contained within itself the elements of Republicanism ; and this has been the reason why it has been successful in finding adherents at all times and in all places. There is not one single Lodge but can proudly boast of having invariably furthered the cause of Liberty and Fraternity. From henceforward it will be the task of the Republic to carry on the work of Freemasonry, and to exhibit itself to all nations as a glorious pledge of the union which at some future time is to prevail over the whole face of the globe.' We do well to note these words, as they afford undeniable evidence that a social republic realises all a Freemason believes in and hopes for."

During the reign of Napoleon III. the process of democratic fermentation went on in the French Lodges with ever-increasing speed. On the other hand, the more moderate blue Masons complained, as they were ever wont to do, of the extravagant proceedings of some of their Brethren ; nevertheless it was precisely these latter who of all others most clearly apprehended the real spirit of their Order, and who applied themselves with bold energy to carry it out practically in daily life. But in May 1861, a regular revolt broke out in the Grand Orient ; a tiny spark, insignificant enough in itself, having sufficed to make the smouldering ashes blaze out into a glowing flame. Prince Murat, the then Grand Master, had voted in the Senate for the temporal power of the Pope, and a large majority of the two hundred and sixty-nine Lodges of the Orient refused to allow such a crime as this to go unpunished. The Prince of the Reds naturally sided with the rebels; however, from the camp of Murat there issued a pamphlet entitled "Sédition au sein de la Maçonnerie," which placed the conduct of the opposition party in a most unfavourable light. In fact the Grand Master himself designated the majority of his subjects as revolutionary and socialist agitators of the worst kind, adding that even Blanqui and his followers, in 1848, had not gone to greater lengths than these misguided Brethren. All this justified a Legitimist paper of the day in saying, "Rub off the shining varnish of philanthropy and brotherly love, and beneath the brilliant exterior you will find political intrigue, unbelief, and revolution." In accordance with the principles of extreme democracy, religion, Christianity, and the property of individuals were successively attacked. Whilst one voice exclaimed, "Religion, whatever it be, enslaves the conscience," another asserted that "Catholic education destroys all moral sense," and Brother Fauvety wound up by denouncing as cannibals all holders of property, saying, "Every man who consumes without producing, flays and devours his neighbour." The party of Reds wanted to appoint Prince Jerome Bonaparte as Grand Master; but although they formed nine-tenths of the body of Freemasonry, they were nevertheless unable to carry out their design, as the Emperor forbade his amiable cousin to accept the proposed honour, nominating in his stead to the Grand Mastership a Protestant, Marshal Magnan, who was not even a Mason, and had therefore in the course of one day to be initiated into the whole series of thirty-three grades. Occurrences such as these excited at that time much attention in other countries, and might have been productive of much that was disagreeable for the Craft. On this account the Allgemeine Zeitung of May 26, 1861, felt bound to speak in behalf of its friends (such of them, at least, as were to be found on German soil), in the following paragraph:—"Are we not justified in concluding, from recent events in France, that Revolution, and especially organised Democracy, when unable to subsist under any other form, joined the ranks of Freemasonry; so that its most active militia are now formed of members of the Craft, and it stands in close connection with the Italian Lodges, over which Cavour is said to exercise so powerful an influence?" By these words public opinion is doubly deceived, whether intentionally or unintentionally, we are not in a position to decide. In the first place, there was no question of an organised democracy in the French Lodges, but of Socialism of a very dangerous description. Furthermore, this revolutionary agitation is falsely laid at the door of the so-called Saviours of Society, who, being then in power, by their measures of repression are said to have forced the movement into the shade of the Lodges. But the truth is, that Socialism had been at home there for centuries ; it is, in fact, no foundling adopted out of compassion, but the legitimate offspring of the Craft.<sup>1</sup>

But the apple of discord, thrown among the labouring portion of the community, had not proved influential enough to bring the designs of the Socialists to maturity. The malcontents had yet to be disciplined, and formed into a compact cosmopolitan body. This was done when the League of the International was founded in St Martin's Hall, London, September 28, 1864.<sup>2</sup> It is notorious that on this occasion the adepts of Freemasonry took a leading share in the transac-

<sup>1</sup> One of the writers in the Historisch Politische Blätter (p. 421) fell into the same error, as is proved by the following extract:—"We opine that the struggle of Socialism against capital and landed property in France, being forcibly repressed in its external manifestations, has taken refuge in the Lodges, making them a very hell for the unfortunate bourgeoisie, who formerly took the lead there. While political Liberalism alone was in question, this bourgeoisie held unlimited sway in the Ministry and in the Chambers, no less than in the Lodges. Times will soon change, if they have not already changed. The existence of the bourgeoisie is now only possible under the ægis of imperial despotism, and even in the Lodges it is only upheld by force. Things have not as yet gone so far in Germany ; this constitutes the difference in the state of Freemasonry in the two countries." We think that sufficient evidence has now been forthcoming from Germany to prove the essentially socialistic nature of Freemasonry. It is, however, true that on the right bank of the Rhine the external life of the Church has yet to be stifled, to effect which the Craft has just made a compact with the Liberal Government. When this point has been reached, we need not doubt that the Secret Society will push on further. But we must let it run the length of its tether ; it lacks neither patience nor perseverance, although it has to pass through many stages of existence.

tions, and that the ultimate aims of the Craft plainly showed themselves beneath the blouse of the workman.

And when, during the terrible seventy-two days which elapsed between March 18th and May 29th 1871, the International held its first passage of arms within the walls of Paris, Freemasonry exhibited a truly maternal tenderness towards this her own peculiar child. A procession, composed of at least five thousand persons, in which members of all the grades, not excepting those of women, took part, wearing their insignia, and in which 150 Lodges of France were represented, wended its way to the town hall of Paris. Maillet, bearing the red flag as a token of universal peace,<sup>1</sup> headed the band, and openly proclaimed, in a speech which met with the approval of all present, that the new Commune was the antitype of Solomon's temple, and the cornerstone of the social fabric about to be raised by the efforts of the Craft. The negotiations carried on by Freemasons with the Government of Versailles on behalf of the Socialists, and the way in which they planted the banners of the Craft on the walls of the Capital, accompanying this action with a threat of instantly joining the ranks of the combatants if a single shot were fired at one of those banners, was all of a piece with the sentiments they expressed. Elie

<sup>1</sup> It must not be forgotten that Freemasonry contemplates a final and social revolution, the most terrible, but at the same time most salutary, of all, which is to be the forerunner of universal peace.

Reclus, a man of letters, one of the principal writers in the Revue des Deux Mondes, the great journal of Freemasonry, distinguished himself as a furious champion of the Communist cause.

Hitherto we have mainly laid before the reader the transactions of French Masons, in order to illustrate the socialist theories as they appear when put in practice. We know well what the children of darkness will reply to us. They will have recourse to their usual subterfuge, namely this—"Such things do occur in some lands, and injudicious Brethren are to blame for them. But with us the case is quite different; nowhere are more loyal subjects to be found than in the Lodges of this country." On this account we have, at the risk of exhausting our reader's patience, endeavoured as far as possible to let Freemasons speak for themselves, by bringing forward witnesses of various nationalities, and constantly referring to the rules and ritual of the Craft. All has pointed in the same direction, namely, of proving that Socialism was born and bred in the lap of Freemasonry. But the descent of the ladder must be a gradual process; to spring at one leap from the highest round to the lowest, and incur the obvious risk of breaking one's neck, would be an act of sheer madness. First must come a liberal revolution, brought about by the storming of a Bastille, or, in a slower and more constitutional way, with the forced concurrence of a Prime Minister, who has long been deprived of his liberty of action; and when the poison has had time to circulate freely, then the moment comes to speak of a social revolution. In France the liberal convulsion took place long ago ; it has even passed already through several fresh stages, and the curtain will soon rise on the second act of the drama. Hence in that country, more than in any other, can the Freemason venture to enunciate boldly his schemes of universal happiness. In Germany, on the contrary, Liberalism has been left a long way behind, and the Craft has plenty of work on its hands, that is to say, the work of advancing Liberalism at the expense of ecclesiastical liberty, of Christian marriage, Christian education, Christian faith and practice. When this business has been duly despatched, the work of Socialism will begin, as surely as two and two make four. In Belgium, a country which in 1830 accepted Liberalism as a christening gift, Freemasonry has already shown its socialistic proclivities by the recognition of such plebeian hangers-on as the Solidaires and Free-thinkers, themselves most zealous partisans of the International. In September 1871, Zorilla, the Grand Master of Spain, threatened, unless his wishes were complied with, to let loose the International in that country. Plain proof enough of the intimate relations existing between the two. In Italy we meet with the very same thing. Since the year 1848, Piedmont has thrown herself into the arms of the Craft, and has found in it her greatest ally in spreading the liberal revolution throughout the Peninsula. But as the last stage has long since been reached by the occupation of Rome, Freemasonry is now beginning to show a fresh side of its character, and betraying, in the person of its most active members, those socialistic tendencies which threaten to deal with the liberal monarchy in much the same way as it dealt with the petty sovereigns of former days. The next social earthquake in this unhappy country will shake to its very foundations, if it does not completely overthrow, the old order of things.

From among the most recent events in Italy we select the following as specially calculated to manifest the socialist tendencies of Freemasonry. Garibaldi and Mazzini, the well-known revolutionary leaders, and at the same time high dignitaries of the Secret Society, agreed, at the Socialist Congress held in Rome, November 1871, upon a common course of action, namely, the establishment of a national social and democratic republic in Italy. And when, eight days after the death of Mazzini, on the 10th March 1872, the socialist party in Rome made a solemn funeral procession to the Capitol in his honour, their ranks were swelled by a great number of Freemasons with bands of music, and 150 banners. But still more significant were the preparations made for the great blow which the social democrats of Italy proposed to strike on occasion of a contemplated popular gathering to be held in the Roman Coliseum on November 24, 1872. With this end in view, the Freemasons met in Congress some weeks previously

(1st-3d Nov.) at a villa near the village of Locarno, in the district of Novara.<sup>1</sup> On October 29th, the representatives of several Italian Lodges had already met in Genoa. These were Filippo Cordova (from the parent Lodge in Rome), Antonio de Franchi (Naples), Benedetto Maria La Vaccara (Palermo), Andrea Giovanelli (Florence), Alberto Mario (Turin), and Quadrio (Genoa). On the following day, they continued their journey by way of Alexandria and Arona to Locarno, where, on their arrival, they found Felix Pyat<sup>2</sup> (France), Kossuth (Hungary), Klapka (Switzerland), and General Etzel (Prussia). The sittings in the villa lasted from 4 P.M. until midnight, and during that time not one of the "Brethren" was allowed to leave the house under any pretext whatsoever, with the exception of one young Prussian, who filled the post of Secretary to Etzel and shorthand writer to the Assembly. The Congress was opened by Etzel, with a speech delivered in French, upon these three points—1. Would a war between France, such as it is under Thiers, and Italy, such as it is under the consorteria (the Conservative party in the Government), be a suitable means of furthering the cause of Democracy?<sup>1</sup> 2. What are the principles which ought to form the basis of a new provisional Government, under the dictatorship of Gambetta in France, and under that of Garibaldi in Italy? 3. What new form of worship is to supersede Catholicism? These questions were answered as follows by the votes of the majority:—1. As the use of any means by which the cause of Democracy may be furthered is justifiable, war is a suitable means to be employed. 2. Communist principles with a new religious ideal. 3. The new Gospel of Democracy according to Brother Renan (Part IV. chap. xli.), published in the form of question and answer (ridotta a catechismo). After this the following resolutions were passed:—

1. To support the insurrectionary committees in the issue of notes of the value of five francs.

2. To lay in a store of arms and ammunition.

3. To establish a secret corps for the discovery, notification, and surveillance of the principal Catholic writers, and of the most influential members of the clergy and aristocracy, in order that every possible means may be employed to overcome the existing opposition to the civil and religious changes which it is desirable to introduce. The object of the proposed popular meeting was stated to be the following: To gauge the power of social democracy, to help it to give free expression to its opinions, to feel the pulse of national enthusiasm, and see what can be done with the masses.

The projected demonstration of November 24 was prevented by the vigilance of the Government, large forces of the military and of the police being called out. Nevertheless, on November 22, the conspirators agreed upon their plan of action, the Patto Romano, forming it after the model of the Paris Commune, and determined forthwith to enter upon the path of secret conspiracy. Twenty-three Italian Lodges immediately gave in their adhesion to the scheme, a proceeding which made no small stir. On this account the Perseveranza, a Milanese journal, in the number published December 6, 1872, sought to justify the Craft, on the score of only twenty-three Lodges having taken part in the plan. But this article, intended as a defence, only served as an accusation. We will give it word for word—"It cannot be denied that twenty-three Lodges were a party to these transactions; six belonging to the Orient of Leghorn, five to that of Palermo, the other twelve being the Lodges of Regalbuto, Genoa, Ravenna, Alessandria, Messina, Rome, Cagliari, Parma, Marola, Spezia, Massa, and Pietra-Santa. In case any one should be anxious to know the names of each, we will subjoin them here. The Lodges of the Orient of Leghorn, the Virtuous Leaders (i virtuosi anziani), Garibaldi and the Future, the Modern Pelican, the Reappear-

ing Dawn, Unitaria, Modern Revolution.<sup>1</sup> I give the names of the Lodges of the Orient of Palermo, also word for word. The Freemasons doubtless have their own reasons for selecting these names, and who knows what influence they may have on our future; one far greater, perhaps, than we at present suspect. The names are as follows:—

“1. Liberty, Fraternity, Equality. Universal Freemasonry, Family, Italy. Lodge George Washington of the Orient of Palermo. The only known delegate (of November 24) of this Lodge was Luigi Castellazzo, who also represented Leghorn.

“2. Lodge Mount Lebanon, of the ancient and recognised Scotch rite, of the Orient of Palermo. Ignazio Catalani, Worshipful Master; Vincenzo Cucchiara, Senior Warden; Giovanni Rosa, Speaker; deputy sent to the Committee (November 24) Ulysse Bacci, living at Rome, the director of the Masonic Review (Rivista Massonica).

“4. Lodge Il Rene, of the Orient of Palermo. Officials unknown; deputy, Napoleon Parboni, of Rome, a strong partisan and promoter of the Social Congress, and Vice-President of the Preparatory Committee.

“Here,” continues the Perseveranza, “we have the aggregate of the Lodges which voted with

the Committee. Not a single one out of Apulia, where, nevertheless, there is a Lodge in every village and an Orient in every town; not one out of Naples, where they may be counted by dozens, and where, I believe, they are divided into three orthodox Orients, not to speak of the unorthodox ones; only a few of Sicily and Tuscany; scarcely any of Emilia and Liguria; none of either Romagna or Venice; only one of Rome. Of all the Sicilian Lodges, only six made common cause with the Committee. The sum total of the Lodges in agreement with it is merely twenty-three, a very small proportion of the whole body of Italian Freemasons."

Thus far the Perseveranza. This article places two points beyond a doubt: 1. That Freemasonry has spread far and wide in Italy, a fact which plainly bodes no little danger to the throne and to society; 2. That in spite of the vigorous measures taken by the Government, twenty-three Lodges ventured to declare openly for the socialist republic; a number which, under existing circumstances, is no trifling one, and affords convincing proof of the socialist tendencies of the whole Order. How many more Lodges were restrained by prudential motives, deeming it the wiser course to keep in the background for a time, because they reckoned amongst their members many Government officials? And not one of the professedly loyal Lodges entered a protest against the procedure of the twenty-three democratic ones. On the contrary, we find the Italian Masons of the Scotch rite issuing a circular, which was printed at Rome and published in the Unità Cattolica of December 17, 1872,<sup>1</sup> in which, without any circumlocution, they boldly proclaimed the new duties devolving on Freemasons, to fight against the Church and the Government established in Rome; and, furthermore, enjoined on every man the duty of all possible exertion, in order to train up the people to the exercise of true liberty, and thus prepare for the advent of that happy day when both religion and idolatry will have ceased to exist, when there will be neither tyrants nor slaves, neither fortunate nor unfortunate, but one great corporation of well-instructed families, independent and free, active and happy.<sup>2</sup>

In the present day, both in Italy and elsewhere, religion forms the centre round which all parties

revolve ; even political opinions take their colouring from religious views. All real and thorough Christians declare themselves loyal subjects of the lawful and established Government ; all those half-hearted, timid warriors, who are Christians only in name, profess liberal views, whilst atheists wave on high the banner of Democracy. Therefore the Secret Society, charging its members with the mission of spreading unbelief amongst the nations of Europe, makes them at the same time apostles of Democracy ; and every state which purchases for itself immunity from covert attack, by consenting to the secularisation of marriage, of education, and of social institutions, hastens the triumph of Republicanism. The Secret Society knows this better than do any of those who tremble before it ; on this account, true to its old system of deceit, it casts the blame of all civil disturbances on the small party of united and uncompromising Christians, reproaching them with being dangerous to the State, and repeating the accusation so often, that at length all simpletons believe it. What is called "public opinion" nowadays is nothing but the voice of a corrupt and mercenary press, under the influence of Freemasonry. When will men rouse themselves ? How much longer is the fate of nations to be abandoned to the tender mercies of the "Brethren ?" We know not, but one thing at least is certain, that heaven has decreed that as the sin of each man, so shall be his punishment.

A similar fate is in store for Germany, unless we can be wise in time. The contented Freemason, who is far from dreaming that anything lurks behind the Liberalism of the day, will, when the witch-dance of Socialism and Fraternity-proper opens, stare in blank amazement, especially as he finds his hands fettered and his tongue tied by a thousand oaths; but he cannot escape eating the fruit of what he has sown, and his teeth will be all the more set on edge the more honestly he has laboured in cultivating the noxious tree. As far back as 1849, the unhappy De Lamennais gave in the Réforme the following truthful sketch of the impending disasters:—"In virtue of his sovereign prerogative, man rises up against God and declares himself to be free and equal to Him. In the name of Freedom, all political and social institutions are overthrown, in the name of Equality all hierarchies are destroyed, all religious and political ascendancy is abolished. . . . Then the reign of violence, of hatred, and of terror begins over the corpse of priest and king, a fearful fulfilment of the prophecy: a whole nation shall rise up, man against man, neighbour against neighbour; amidst terrible confusion the child will rise up against the old man, and the people against their great ones. In order to depict these terrific scenes of horror and crime, of licence and butchery, this carnival of error, this chaos of outlawry and debauchery, these blasphemous shouts and devilish songs, the dull and unceasing sounds of the destroyer's hammer and the executioner's sword, the explosion of bursting mines and the yells of exultant joy which hail the widespread carnage;—in order, I say, to depict scenes such as these, it were necessary to borrow the language of demons, as some monsters appear to have rivalled them in their fury. (Cf. Journal de Bruxelles, December 3, 1849).

CHAPTER VIII.

THE COVERT WAR CARRIED ON BY THE SECRET SOCIETY AGAINST GOD.

OPEN hatred of God has been stated to be the most striking characteristic of the present day, and, certainly, it cannot be denied that a terrible stream of impiety pervades the whole of the atmosphere by which we are surrounded. Whilst it is, on the one hand, a cheering sight to see the Children of the Cross cling all the more closely to the symbol of our salvation now that danger threatens it, and to behold them evince so marvellous a spirit of self-sacrifice, and an enthusiasm which recalls the earliest days of Christianity; on the other hand, it is lamentable to witness the unblushing audacity with which society at large publicly parades in politics, in science, in the press, and in daily life, the fact of its apostasy from God and from His Anointed. It is of course indisputably true that in all times and in most places some have been found to deny the God who created them; but this deplorable fall to the last and lowest depth to which human nature can sink has invariably been the mournful result of intellectual error or moral depravity, and the few who have fallen thus low have been contented with toleration at the hands of their fellowmen. But since the commencement of the last century unbelief has advanced with rapid strides; it has come not only to be regarded as on a level with orthodox belief, but even to claim precedence over it. Those countries and peoples which have given such corrupting opinions free admittance into their midst, and allowed them to make good their footing in society, proudly boast of superior cultivation and refinement, and dignify their unbelief with the name of intelligence. Furthermore, in order to cope with the overwhelming superiority of numbers on the side of belief, they strive, by secularising all education, from the village school up to the University, to make themselves masters of the rising generation, and consequently, of the future.<sup>1</sup> Thus mankind is being gradually dragged on to a pre-determined goal. De Camille has depicted the true state of things as follows:—"No one can prognosticate what terrible secrets may be hid for us in the womb of the future, but all must acknowledge that recent times have given birth to a hideous offspring; pseudo-refinement, falsified public opinion, spurious science, sophistical principles, untrue ideas, false desires, a perverted conscience, and corrupt morals—all these meet us at every turn, and nothing escapes their infection. They spread to the royal palace and to the lowly hut; they influence both the highest minister of the Crown and the ragged urchin who shouts in the rear of a popular demonstration ; they have distorted, enfeebled, and in some instances done away with the homage paid by Governments to truth, justice, and morality ; or at least they have so far stunned and intimidated those in power as to destroy in them that strongest instinct alike of the individual and of the nation, the instinct of self-preservation.<sup>1</sup> And in the face of these menacing clouds, liberal Christians can still reconcile it with their conscience, to make concessions to the spirit of darkness under cover of modern ideas, to enter into an agreement with it, and consent to carry grist to Beelzebub's mill, on condition that he should refrain from interfering in their own private oratory.

The spirit of hostility to God could never have attained its present proportions, and its actual power, if the forces at its command had not been thoroughly disciplined and organised. For individual unbelievers can only corrupt individuals, and even numbers without concerted action have no power to turn the current of social life into fresh channels. Especially in opposition to the serried ranks of the Church, an undisciplined army, however numerous, can effect next to nothing. But of late, apostasy from God has shown itself to be a persecutor of the people of God ; and this new phase of its character becomes daily more apparent. Already it has succeeded in making itself the almost absolute master of what is erroneously called "public opinion," and in rendering legislature so difficult in those States which remain true to their historical traditions and established rights, that the Government has sometimes suspended its action altogether, or, in other cases, despairing of being able to cope with the enemy who batters so loudly at the gates, has delivered over to him the keys of the citadel.

In Freemasonry we find the power which organises the terrible and occult forces that are at work amongst us. In the following pages it will be our endeavour briefly to review the principal forms which this enmity to God has successively assumed, and in this way to expose the true and ultimate aim of them all.

It is, of course, self-evident that the League could only attain to its final antitheistic goal by passing through various stages. And here we may distinguish four different streams, which often intersect one another, and often run parallel; a revival of Judaism; Deism, Pantheism, and that lowest and worst of all, the Antitheism of humanity, which would have man occupy the throne of the Most High, declaring God an usurper, and man himself the true Deity! We will now proceed to examine these four external manifestations in detail. With regard to the two first, it will not be necessary to go into great detail, as we have already had occasion to say much that bears directly on the subject in the second and fourth divisions of this work.

I. A shallow Judaism was the first form of religion which the Secret Society substituted for revealed faith ; and this explains the frequent reference made in its official documents to the esoteric teaching of the East, transmitted to it by means of the Templars. These Jewish doctrines, which are chiefly directed against the New Testament revelation, often recall the Sadducees and Samaritans of our Lord's time, since, like these, they acknowledge no divine ✓ revelation subsequent to that of Moses, have a strong element of Epicureanism, and recognise no sacred writings but their Pentateuch, which, moreover, differs considerably from our own. What Freemasonry asserts concerning its connection with Gnostic teaching may to a certain extent be true, in so far as it limited to a shallow morality the diluted Judaism it taught, and amalgamated at pleasure any dogmatic theories it might chance to possess, with either Pantheistic, Gnostic, or Manichean elements.<sup>1</sup> But it is well known that the Brotherhood does not trouble itself much about such trifles. Inasmuch as the existence of a God is matter of belief at all, He is the ✓ "Supreme Architect of the Universe," and One in person, the doctrine of the Most Holy Trinity being a Papal invention. Redemption by Jesus Christ is rejected as a heretical belief originated by the Druses of Lebanon, which spread to the West, and became the basis of the Papal power. The real Saviour, i.e., the political and social liberator, is rather the Jesus or Josue of the Old Testament, the son of Nun, and related to Moses and Aaron, who introduced relaxations of those unduly severe religious laws which were founded on abuses in external life. Here we have teaching plainly opposed to the doctrine of the Trinity, harmonising in the main with the tenets of the Monarchians, the Arians, and the Socinians, and offering naturally many points of attraction to those who deny the divinity of Christ. Perhaps the modern Judaism of the present day is derived from this source. And as the adoption of views such as these pledges the Freemason to a lifelong enmity to the Saviour in whom Christians believe, it is easy to understand that the strict Jew, inspired with the same zeal which animated Saul, is with no great difficulty prevailed on to join the Craft. Long experience teaches us that the contingent contributed by Judaism to the ranks of Freemasonry is comparatively larger than that of any other religious body; it is said that the descendants of Abraham compose two-thirds of the Grand Orient of Paris.

This judaising tendency is very apparent in a document now before us, published by the Orient of Brussels, "to the greater glory of the Supreme Architect of the world, in the year of true light 5838 (1838), with the object of commending a work by the Freemason Marziale Reghelini (de Schio), in the interests of Masonry, entitled, "Histoire du vrai Jésus Christ Nazaréen." As this publication supplies all the information necessary to give us a nearer acquaintance with the subject before us, the reader will permit us to make a somewhat lengthy extract from it, which, in spite of its serious nature, cannot fail to provoke an occasional smile:—

“The instruction imparted to every Freemason, and the emblems wherewith our temples are adorned, combine to teach him that our Order or Brotherhood is descended from the Knights-Templar, and their illustrious Grand Master, Jacques Molay. Every Brother who possesses the least acquaintance with the history of the Crusaders, knows that they were driven out of Palestine by Saladin the Great at the end of the twelfth century. Although that province was then in the hands of the Mohammedans, the Templars, thanks to their honourable conduct, were allowed to retain possession of some hospices, where such of their Brethren could find shelter as came from the West on a pilgrimage to the grave of Jesus Christ, the liberator of mankind. In the times of truce between the Mohammedans and the Crusaders, a continuous stream of Templars flowed into Jerusalem; and the hospitable and friendly terms on which they lived with the inhabitants of the country, enabled them easily to obtain an intimate acquaintance with the old traditions of Arabia, of which country Palestine forms a part. In this manner their eyes were opened to the delusive nature of that false fame, attracted by which, for more than two centuries, the misguided nations of the West had been led to seek a grave in the deserts of Asia and Egypt. They plainly saw, moreover, that fanaticism had been the means of involving Europe in an unjust war, and that the belief in the grave of Jesus of Bethlehem, as that of the liberator of mankind, was a mere fable, on which the Popes built up their power;<sup>1</sup> for when Omar, on the conquest of Jerusalem, in the year 636, according to the ordinary calendar, discovered that the temple of Solomon had been long since destroyed, he rebuilt it on the former site, dedicating it to the Incomprehensible and Eternal One; for, doing this, he received the name of San-cratius. Furthermore, with the intention of honouring Jesus (Josue), the son of Mary Amram, and nephew of Aaron and Moses, he removed into this temple the grave which the Arabic Christians belonging to the army of Mohammed and Omar venerated and made pilgrimages to, in remembrance of their own Saviour and Lawgiver. Thus the Templars arrived at the conviction that the belief in Jesus of Bethlehem, as a Being both human and divine, equal to God His Father, and like Him eternal, was nothing but the old heresy of unorthodox Christians, or an imitation of the heresy of the Druses of Lebanon, who, a century before the commencement of the Crusades, i.e., in 996, believed, as they now believe, that in the Caliph Hakim, the Eternal Creator had become incarnate. No sooner had the Templars become aware of this error, than they embraced the faith of Jesus, the son of Mary Amram, whose life had been spent in proclaiming the mercy of the Eternal God, and preaching the hope of a future existence. This code of mercy they adopted as their own.

“By means of some fragments of the real Pentateuch, the Templars at the same time learnt that this Jesus, son of Mary Amram, had, under the mysterious name of Osee, been chosen chief Captain, and consecrated High Priest by the law-giver Moses (Deut. xxxi. 7, 8, 14, 23; xxxii. 44; xxxiv. 9), and that on the death of this latter, Jesus announced a new law of justice and equality, and abolished the priesthood of Juda, who, during the latter years of Moses' lifetime, had got all power into his own hands, and employed it to bring the Israelites into a disgraceful bondage, called the Nazarean. All this our Brethren of former times found recorded in the Pentateuch, the Koran, the Arabic traditions, and popular beliefs. The dogmatic truths and liberal doctrines of Jesus, the son of Mary Amram, were brought to Europe by the Templars; the Order increased in numbers and influence, and the spread of these doctrines caused great uneasiness to despots and priests, who gave themselves out for the heirs and representatives of the priesthood of Juda, abrogated by the liberator Jesus."

Next follows an account of the execution of Jacques Molay, plainly designed to cast odium on the authors of the deed, upon the king, and especially—here the Belgian origin of the whole thing is betrayed—upon bishops and upon the Pope. Those Templars who escaped the general massacre (so runs the tale) carried on in Europe the building of the temple to the Great Architect of the Universe with untiring energy, combating feudal oppression under the cloak of the freedom which a corporation enjoyed, and of the useful calling they followed. In this work the principles of Liberty and Humanity, learnt in the East, were of no small service to them. In France, Germany, England, Italy, and elsewhere, they became the terror of landed proprietors, and of the higher clergy. In order to render their position secure, they formed themselves into a body of stone-cutters and Free masons, and established a noviciate for the purpose of testing the courage, perseverance, and discretion of candidates. But through the ill-advised reception of some prominent members of the aristocracy and clergy, the old spirit of the Order became deteriorated, and by imprudent interference in politics, its members exposed themselves anew to the danger of persecution. Finally, however, the true doctrine was revived, and the right course of conduct returned to. The document we quote from proceeds as follows :—

“The traditions preserved throughout the whole Order show that our ancestors admitted no other doctrines than those of Jesus, the son of Mary Amram. In order that these might not be lost, a sealed copy has been handed down by the first Superiors of the Order, the genuineness of which is evident and undeniable. It ordains—

“1. That at the head of every document issued by the Brethren, in an individual or corporate capacity, should stand a profession of faith in our Lawgiver Jesus, the son of Mary Amram, the invariable formula to be employed being, ‘To the glory of the Great Architect of the Universe,’ expressed by the nine initial letters, A. L. G. D. G. A. D. L. U. (A la Gloire du Grand Architecte de l’Univers), to expose and oppose the errors of Pope and priest, who commence everything in the name of their Trinity.”

“2. That all proceedings at the opening or at the closing of our Lodges, as well as all documents either of individual members or of the Brotherhood in general, should be dated from the Creation of the World, or the Era of Light, in opposition to the modern system of chronology invented in the end of the eleventh century by a Pope, who introduced the use of a later era; a pitiful and cowardly artifice by which to obtain universal recognition of the event from which he dated.”

“3. That in remembrance of the Last Supper or Christian Lovefeast of Jesus the Son of Mary Amram, an account of which is given in the Arabic traditions and in the Koran, a solemn festival should be held, accompanied by a distribution of bread, in commemoration of an ancient custom observed by the slaves of eating bread together, and of their deliverance by means of the liberator (Josue). The distribution is to be accompanied by these memorable words—‘This is the bread of misery and oppression which our fathers were forced to eat under the Pharaos, the priests of Juda; whosoever hungers let him come and eat; this is the Pascal sacrifice (of the liberator Josue); come unto us, all you who are oppressed; yet this one year more in Babylon, and the next year shall see us free men.’ This instructive, and at the same time commemorative, supper of the Rosicrucians, is the counterpart of the Supper of the Papists.”

“4. That in honour of our Jesus, spoken of in the Pentateuch under the name of Osee, all our work should begin and end with a threefold and joyous huzza for him; and this salutation is to be repeated every time that a guest or a deputation is brought into the temple, as well as at the opening of a lovefeast, and after every toast drunk on festive occasions. This huzza consists in the thrice-repeated exclamation, Osee, Osee, Osee, i.e., Long live the memory of Jesus, son of Mary Amram! . . . . .”

“Such are the ordinances of our masters; the traditional interpretation of them has always been preserved in the Orient of Venice.<sup>1</sup> This is consequently the creed of Freemasonry; it rests upon the system of Jesus, the Christ, the Liberator of Israel, who instituted a liberal and moderate code of laws, and abrogated the priesthood of Juda; a creed laid down in Arabic traditions, in the Koran and Pentateuch, and by those historical writers commonly known under the name of the prophets. All this proves to a demonstration the real object of papal anathemas, now no longer hurled against monarchs, or those amongst their subjects who adopt reformed views. Priestly dread of the disclosure of the truth is the real cause of the persecutions constantly renewed against Freemasonry; for the Western Popes are well aware that we alone possess in our traditions and sacramental words evidence that must sooner or later bring about the destruction of the spiritual ascendancy and chimerical dominion of Rome."

Even here, in this earliest stage, the antitheistic strain which runs through all the higher grades of Freemasonry already becomes apparent.<sup>2</sup> We have not to do with theoretical unbelief, nor with a simple denial of the positive beliefs of others, but with an element of active aggression which strikes at the root of Christianity, and is determined to gain the mastery over it. We deal with a foe prepared for a hand-to-hand fight with the God of revelation, and ready to run an equal race with Christianity, in seeking proselytes amongst all classes of society. On the authority of a wild fiction, alleged to rest upon the incontrovertible testimony of ancient records and testimony never forthcoming, the unwary candidate is persuaded into rejecting the books of Holy Scripture and into looking upon the Pentateuch itself—our version of it, at least—as spurious. The Saviour adored by Christians is represented as being a common Jew of Bethlehem, who was confounded with the ancient Josue, the son of Nun, by the credulous and barbarous Druses of Lebanon, and afterwards exalted to be the God of Christendom by the Western Popes, for the furtherance of their own selfish aims.<sup>1</sup> As a matter of fact, Freemasonry refuses to acknowledge any Redeemer except a democratic liberator of society, the Josue (Jesus) of the Old Testament, the champion of religious enlightenment. His religion, the only true one, is limited to two tenets; belief in an eternal and merciful God, and in a future existence. The fact of having a priesthood which is a class apart involves the slavery of the rest of mankind; on this account it must be done away with, and he who overthrows it is a true philanthropist and faithful follower of Josue, who did so much in his day, besides conferring on his people the blessing of a liberal and moderate code of laws. Thus, according to these views, Liberty and Equality constitute the only real and practical religion, and to struggle against despots, aristocrats, and the clergy, is the lifelong vocation of a true son of the Craft. The opening formula of even the most unimportant document is a tacit protest against the "absurd popish invention of a Trinity." Finally, the most sacred mystery of the Christian religion, the Holy Eucharist, is shamelessly travestied and made to figure in a socialistic comedy, as "the bread of misery and oppression," that oppression under which the world at large lies groaning, and on its distribution in the Lodges, is accompanied by the portentous words, "This year you still sigh in the Babylon of political, social, and religious slavery, but next year you shall be free men," free from the yoke of religion above all.<sup>1</sup> Therefore war with Rome, war with the knavish Pope, war against his spiritual ascendancy and fantastic dominion; and war, too, with all whose beliefs are not limited to faith in the Josue of Masonic legends, the social and religious liberator of mankind.

II. To England appertains the honour of giving birth to Deism, and bestowing it as a birthday gift on the Secret Society, to celebrate its entrance, in 1717, upon a new stage of its existence, the three persons chiefly concerned in the transaction being out-and-out Deists. This shallowest of all so-called systems of philosophy only recognises the existence of such objects as can be seen and handled; it is a fungus growing upon the decaying trunk of Protestantism, and refuses absolutely to acknowledge whatever is supernatural and immaterial. This threadbare natural religion, out of which every man is at liberty to fashion garments according to his own pattern, recognises at most a higher Being, who has made the visible world, or who, as Architect of the universe, has constructed the things we see around us out of pre-existing matter; who, His work once finished, troubles Himself no more about man and his doings; who least of all has given to the world a positive revelation of His being and His will. Here, in short, we have the "Jehovah" of the Rosicrucians, the "Great Architect" of all lower grades. It is notorious with what avidity these notions were caught up by empty heads in England, France, and

Germany, and with what astounding rapidity they spread, both within and without the Lodges, assuming importance, finally, under the pretentious name of Rationalism. This was for many years the weapon employed by the Secret Society in its war against the God of revelation, one which, even in the present day, it continues to turn against all who see in the truths of the faith anything more than a mass of wax which every man may mould according to his own particular fancy. We have already brought so much evidence to bear on this subject in the former part of this work, that we may content ourselves here with showing how the Secret Society has made use of Deism in its antitheistic warfare, and how it still continues to do so. For this purpose we shall give copious extracts from a publication originally written in High German, of which a Dutch translation appeared in Amsterdam in 1792; a work which is all the more worthy of credence, as it is supported by documentary evidence.<sup>1</sup> It asserts that the whole plan of the enemy may be summed up in the following propositions:—

“ 1. Superstition (i.e., Christianity and the law of

Moses) has hitherto been the mainstay of the tyranny and deception by means of which princes and priests have drawn mankind into their net. Fear of a future life, of an eternity of punishment, had been a motive powerful enough to hold weak minds bowed down under the load of prejudices sucked in with their mother's milk, and to enervate the boldest spirits, rendering them incapable of any great action. This is the evil of Christianity, that it enslaves minds to such a point that they are willing to endure any present suffering, with the consoling hope of a life to come. On this account it becomes indispensable to undermine the pillar which bears up such a structure of superstition ; but as the number of those who yet fondly cling to the pious fictions of their childhood is very large, and the roots of political and civil institutions strike deep in the national soil, it is necessary to go cautiously to work. Here philosophy may take a useful hint from Nature. As man is chiefly worked on through his passions, these must be excited, and Christianity must be made ridiculous, ere the dominion of Faith can be overthrown in the heart.

“ 2. To effect this, a literary association must be formed, to promote the circulation of our writings, and suppress, as far as possible, those of our opponents.

“ 3. For this end we must contrive to have in our pay the publishers of the leading literary journals of the day, in order that they may turn into ridicule and heap contempt on everything written in a contrary interest to our own.

“4. ‘He that is not with us, is against us.’ Therefore we may persecute, calumniate, and tread down such a one without scruple; individuals like this are noxious insects, which one shakes from the blossoming tree, and crushes beneath one’s foot.

“5. Very few can bear to be made to look ridiculous; let ridicule, therefore, be the weapon employed against persons who, though by no means devoid of sense, show themselves hostile to our schemes.

“6. In order the more quickly to attain our end, the middle classes of society must be thoroughly imbued with our principles; the lower orders and the mass of the population are of little importance, as they may easily be moulded to our will. The middle classes are the principal supporters of the Government; to gain them we must work on their passions, and, above all, bring up the rising generation in our ideas, as in a few years they will be in their turn masters of the situation.

“7. Licence in morals will be the best means of enabling us to provide ourselves with patrons at court, persons who are nevertheless totally ignorant of the importance of our cause. It will suffice for our purpose if we make them absolutely indifferent to the Christian religion. They are for the most part careless enough without us.

“8. If our aims are to be pursued with vigour, it is of absolute necessity to regard as enemies of enlightenment and of philosophy all those who cling in any way to religious or civil prejudices, and exhibit this attachment in their writings. They must be viewed as beings whose influence is highly prejudicial to the human race, and a great obstacle to its well-being and progress. On this account it becomes the duty of each one of us to impede their action in all matters of consequence, and to seize the first suitable opportunity which may present itself of putting them entirely hors du combat.

“9. We must ever be on the watch to make all changes in the State serve our own ends ; political parties, cabals, brotherhoods, and unions—in short, everything that affords an opportunity of creating disturbances must be an instrument in our hands. For it is only on the ruins of society as it exists at present that we can hope to erect a solid structure on the natural system, and ensure to the worshippers of nature the free exercise of their rights.”

It is easy to see that this plan is a facsimile of the work which the Secret Society had not merely sketched out, but actually begun, in concert with the so-called “philosophers” of France. Animated by a like spirit, and employing the same tools as these latter, Freemasons had for some time past been actively at work at the Courts of Berlin, Weimar, and Vienna, on the banks of the Rhine and the Iser, and they had succeeded in undermining the Christianity of the influential classes. Their efforts were, indeed, attended with less success on the right bank of the Rhine than had been the case on the left; but for this the Brethren themselves were not to blame, the tenacious conservation of the German mind, and the dread excited by the recent horrors enacted in France, proving formidable opponents to struggle against. Another plan was therefore adopted, that of employing science as a means—slower, it is true, but not less sure—of combating revelation, whereby, through the strong materialistic and naturalistic tone imparted to education, a race of men should be trained up whose sight would be strong enough to stand the broad daylight of religious Nihilism. Now hatred of Ultramontanes and of orthodox Catholics is openly preached on the housetops, and the faithful are even expected to be grateful for the exhibition of such pious zeal. But it is all very well to proclaim a thousand times over on the public stage “liberty of conscience and freedom for every shade of opinion and religious persuasion, for every upward tendency and higher aspiration of the human heart.” Behind the scenes there lurks the persecuting Nero, armed with exceptional laws, with outlawry and exile, determined to know no rest until the very name of Nazarean is obliterated. Liberalism, the exoteric teaching of this dark league, is, in its very essence, persecuting and intolerant; any union with it is a preposterous idea, a thing impossible. For forty years the Catholics of Belgium have had to expiate bitterly their ill-advised “Union” of the year 1830; and they daily gain a stronger practical conviction of the truth of the assertion we have just made.

The keynote of Freemasonry is, War to the death against all revelation. As far back as the end of the preceding century it expressed itself in these terms:<sup>1</sup>—"Belief in revelation is a malady to which weak and pious minds are very subject; it is an infectious epidemic, employed ever since the world began, to effect the destruction of human liberty; it is alike incompatible with sound reason and true freedom; it is the parent of fanaticism and superstition." "The laws of the Mosaic and Christian religions are the contemptible inventions of petty minds bent on deceiving others; they are the most extravagant aberrations of the human intellect." "The selfishness of priests, and the despotism of the great, have for centuries upheld this system (of Christianity), since it enabled them to rule mankind with a rod of iron by means of its rigid code of morality, and to confirm their power over weak minds by means of certain oracular utterances, in reality the product of their own invention, but palmed off on the world as the words of revelation."

In reading these strange effusions of the Deistic mind, we must not overlook the fact that political revolution is the object ever kept in view by those who uttered them, an object to the attainment of which the overthrow of religion is nothing but a necessary preliminary. In the present day Freemasons pursue precisely similar aims ; now, however, the Brethren are cautious and prudent, as they were in the early years of the reign of the Emperor Joseph II. ; that is to say, they speak only of the future triumph of an odious unbelief, and wisely abstain from all mention of political intentions.

The following remarks are taken from the Latomia, vol. iv., and form the introduction to a review of the "Kirchenlehre und Ketzerglaube" of Dr A. Drechsler, a work favourably commented on and recommended to the perusal of Freemasons :—" Considered in its religious aspect, Freemasonry forms a whole of which Protestantism is but the half ; this latter regards the substance of religion as a direct communication from God to man, and permits a partial use of reason, in so far as it is necessary to mould this extravagant compound into some sort of shape. According to Freemasonry, on the other hand, it belongs to reason to create not the form alone, but also the substance, of religion. Protestantism must either return to Catholicism and proceed onward till it reaches the domain of Freemasonry, or voluntarily continue to occupy a half-way position between the two ; because reason will not for ever content itself with labouring to give an appearance of reason to facts which are above reason : it must seek in different ways to bring the material supplied to it into union with its own spirit, until, as the final result of these efforts, it arrive at the clear and full conviction of the utter futility of all such attempts at union. At this point it asserts another right indisputably its own; it rejects the stubborn material forced upon its acceptance, and boldly claims to choose for itself, and if need be, to create what is most suitable to its purpose. This gives a clue to the phenomena at present exhibited by Protestant religious life, especially in England, to the allegorical meaning attached to Christian history, to the vague apprehension of Christian dogma. The last efforts made to uphold ecclesiastical Christianity occasioned its complete expulsion from the realm of reason, for they proved but too plainly that all negotiations of peace must result in failure. Human reason became aware of the irreconcilable enmity existing between its own teachings and the dogmas of the Church. . . . Finally, all educated minds felt the need of a brief summary of that which mankind possesses in the Church, and that which is on the other hand offered to it by natural religion."

The upshot of these quotations is exactly the same as that of preceding ones. Christianity, being absolutely incompatible with reason, may perhaps be tolerated for a while as a toy for fools to play with, but it must on no account be allowed to lay down laws for the regulation of public life; this would be an outrage on human reason, which occupies a position of irreconcilable hostility to the teaching of the Church. This course of action does, it is true, involve the setting aside of a positive right; for the safety of the Christian Church is guaranteed by most solemn treaties; but above the positive right stands the natural one, i.e., the right of mankind to unlimited progress; and to this Christianity opposes an obstacle. It remains then to reduce this latter to a condition in which it must be content to live on sufferance. This is the path in which all modern ideas move, both of writers and politicians, exactly as they did at the time of the first French Revolution, and the period which preceded it. The upholders of Christianity form nowadays a mere party in the State—the minority, in fact, although the great mass of the people still clings with tenacity to the Christian faith.

Deism, as professed by Freemasonry, recognises no eternity. In order to defend itself against the attacks of Dr Eckert, a pamphlet was published at Leipzig in 1865, entitled, "The Attitude of Freemasonry in the Present Day, a history and disclosure of the aims of the Craft, together with an answer to the most recent charges brought against it, by E. G. Eckert, D.D.L., Dresden." Notwithstanding all his prudence, the following admission escaped the pen of the advocate:—"Freemasonry teaches nothing impossible; its secret consists in teaching man to discern realities. It instructs him in the art of being good without reference to heaven or hell, independent of the motives of hope and fear. The Mason does not await a future life to receive his reward; he has it here, and is content."

What then can be said to the decree of the Grand

Orient of Paris, which, in 1865, after due revision of its statutes, acknowledged the existence of a God, and of an endless life? It must be pronounced a disgusting piece of hypocrisy, intended to beguile the world of the "profane." That social chaos inevitably follows on the denial of a future life, is testified by the declarations made in the Paris Convention of 1795, immediately after the fall of Robespierre, by Deputy Lecointre. "A people," he says, "which is without religion, without form of worship, without churches, or any public divine service, is also without country and without national customs, and prepares future slavery for itself. Contempt for religion has been the agent in bringing ruin upon this great empire; and a similar fate is in store for every nation whose code of laws is not based on the immutable foundation of morality and religion."

III. We are, however, very far from intending to imply that Freemasons have any religious tenets peculiarly their own, for what they desire to accomplish is rather the overthrow of all religion, and every form of positive belief. In this war of extermination they make use of any destructive theory which may present itself, not excepting Pantheism; in fact, this latter is an auxiliary all the more welcome, because it of all others is the farthest removed from revealed Christianity. Besides, the Craft recognises in Pantheism an old and valued friend, to whom both history and natural religion show her to be nearly related. She herself asserts her connection with the pantheistic Manicheism of the East ; and it was from the study of Arabian disciples of Aristotle that Amalrich of Bena learnt his Pantheism. Much the same thing, too, may be said of the Cathari, the Brethren and Sisters of the Free Spirit, the Albigenses, and even the corrupt portion of the Order of Templars. Almost all the sects of the Middle Ages had a strong pantheistic colouring, and developed into religious and democratic agitators of the very worst description ; and it is precisely from these that the Craft claims genealogical descent, as with these it is historically connected.

It is, moreover, a fact worthy of notice, that Spinoza, the father of modern Pantheism, stood in secret relation to many " Friends," and that all his literary efforts were directed to the end of obtaining acceptance for the opinions of Freemasons throughout the educated world. A few words respecting this remarkable man may well find a place here. Baruch or Benedict Spinoza was born on November 23, 1632, at Amsterdam. His parents were Portuguese Jews, and destined their son to become a Rabbi. He applied himself early to the study of the Bible and the Talmud ; his intellectual gifts, and the remarkable progress he made, excited the admiration of his teachers, although his critical remarks, and the sceptical turn of his mind, aroused their worst misgivings, and led them to threaten him with expulsion from the Synagogue. The ambitious young man then took up with Calvinism, and although at heart an unbeliever in everything supernatural, he made outward profession of belief in the gospel, by frequenting Calvinist and Arminian places of worship. He received instruction in Latin and Greek from a German physician named Van den Ende, an avowed atheist, who met his death in 1674, at the hands of the common hangman, for having taken part in a conspiracy. The Jews, fearing Spinoza might prove a dangerous antagonist, sought to win him back to their Synagogue by means of bribery; and when this attempt failed, they endeavoured to rid themselves of him altogether, one of his own nation actually stabbing him with a knife as he was in the act of leaving the theatre. Through the influence of the Rabbis, he was, in 1655, formally expelled from the Synagogue, and at the same time banished from Amsterdam. From that time he lived mostly in the country; and when, in 1670, he removed to the Hague, he rarely during the remainder of his life appeared out of doors. On February 21, 1677, he died of consumption, at the age of forty-five years. His "Friends" were numerous, and ever ready to give him a helping-hand. Only four years before his death, the Elector-Palatine Charles Louis nominated him to the Professor's Chair of Philosophy at Heidelberg; but this post he declined, on the plea of inability to comply with the condition imposed, namely, "that he should never make any use of philosophy which might lead to the overthrow of existing systems of religion." This little man, of dark and sallow countenance and repulsive features, chiefly confined his studies to theology, mathematics, physics, and philosophy. The whole gist of his teaching may be stated in these propositions:—

X All that exists, God and the world, forms but one substance, which is God, possessed of two attributes, thought (spirit) and extension (matter); from the Universal Substance of producing nature (natura naturans) spring the various forms of existence, individual things, or produced nature (natura naturata). Consequently, he denied the personality of God, His spiritual and supernatural being, the creation of the world,<sup>1</sup> human freedom, the distinction between good and evil. Miracles, according to Spinoza's theory, are an absolute impossibility, since he proposes as the object of religion, no other than the one proposed in all ages by Freemasonry—the introduction of a code of morality regulated by reason. His views of history are as materialistic as his whole system; they all hinge upon fatalism, and may be considered as having set the fashion for the realistic mode of writing history so prevalent at the present day. In regard to persecution, Spinoza was not a whit behind the Craft, of whose teaching he was the principal advocate in modern times. The design of all his studies was to bring about the overthrow of revealed religion by means of science, the persecution of dogmatic religion being his idea of religious liberty. His "Tractatus theologico-politicus"<sup>1</sup> contains the following propositions, so thoroughly in harmony with the spirit of Freemasonry. The aim of religion, he avers, is obedience (avoiding as yet the use of the word "tyranny"); that of philosophy is truth: between these two there can exist, once and for ever, no connection and no relationship; true philosophical religion contains everything which would be left of positive religion, were it stripped altogether of the supernatural element; it needs no faith in history and in miracles for its support, no ceremonies and no future reward, since it is its own reward. Hence it follows that religion is intended for the great mass of mankind, as it is undeniable that the number must always be small of those who, directed by reason, practise virtue for its own sake. At the end of his treatise Spinoza expresses an idea of the Church's rights, which recalls the times of Nero. "Those invested with supreme command in the State have the right to do all which they have the power to do." In other words, "might before right." Here we have the terrible imperial doctrine of State supremacy which, originating with the Cæsars, was later on dressed up by Hegel in a scientific garb, and has for the last two centuries made the life of the Church more and more to resemble a lingering martyrdom, while now it fills anew the hearts of all true Christians with anxious apprehension. These doctrines are the more closely followed by members of the Craft as they find the influence they possess gradually increasing. To these propositions Spinoza appends the following conclusions:—Those who are invested with authority in the State are also empowered to determine what is good and right for the State, to expound Holy Scripture according to their own discretion, and, above all, to order and arrange the externals of divine worship, and the observances of religion, in the way they shall deem most conducive to the public good. For the philosopher, on the contrary, Spinoza claims liberty “to hold what opinions he pleases, and to express those opinions, provided always that he does not assume a hostile attitude towards anything established by law, or encourage political insubordination.” This is as much as to say, “Freedom for ourselves; slavery for our opponents.”

<sup>1</sup> This was written as far back as the year 1663, and was at first privately circulated amongst his friends; but later on, in 1670, it was published anonymously, Hamburg being given as the place where it was printed, instead of Amsterdam. Immediately on its appearance, the work was proscribed by the Dutch Government, but it reappeared, and was widely circulated under an altered title in Holland, England, Germany, France, Switzerland, and elsewhere—proof enough that other agencies were at work in the matter. For Spinoza's life, doctrines, and writings, see Feller, "Biographie universelle. Wetzer-Welte, Kirchen-lexicon," under Spinoza.

Thus, with the assistance of his allies, this Jew of Amsterdam became the father of popular philosophic Rationalism, and especially of modern Pantheism, down to the time of Ed. V. Hartmann, the philosopher of the Unknown. The inevitable consequence of this line of argument is to give the foremost place amongst all classes of human knowledge to natural science, and at the same time to supply a formidable weapon for the attack on positive religion. His theories of Church policy constitute the ideal of all religious persecutors, whether secret or open; the amicable relation formerly existing between Church and State, which was the bulwark of society and of good manners, is now no more, and the powers of darkness are incessantly at their work of devastation, striving to bring about that last and most terrible convulsion which, like a second deluge, is to overwhelm the whole human race.

In its true nature, Freemasonry has ever been pantheistic.<sup>1</sup> The so-called Natural Religion and Worship of Nature which it professes prove this, and numerous documents may be found to bear testimony to the fact. We will quote a few of these.

The Latomia, a Masonic periodical published quarterly at Leipsic, speaks as follows (vol. v., p. 35):—“Egypt is to be regarded as the cradle of all our learning, especially as being the land where Craftsmen were first initiated into the Secret Society as it then existed, into the Corporation or Fraternity of Masons. Throughout the whole of Asia Busiris the sun-god was adored under the name of Mythras and the emblem of fire; the temples of the Freemason are likewise enlightened by the presence of that life-giving symbol!" Thus, among the Freemasons, Heliogabalus, one of the maddest of the Roman emperors, might find a large number of pious scholars, like himself, priests and servants of the sun.

In the Freemasons' Journal of Vienna, "for private circulation amongst the Brethren" (vol. xi. 3, p. 21), the Speaker of the Lodge thus addresses his hearers—"In early times the Samothracians worshipped only the heaven and the earth, since Nature was to them father and mother, and there were then no priests and despots, who by means of craft and force, superstition and oppression, mental and physical coercion, led them to disown, and even to hate, their Divine Creator." In harmony with this pantheistic worship of Nature is the Masonic practice of not merely dating from the Creation of the World, but making the year begin on June 24th, the summer solstice.

In the Astræa, the Freemasons' Pocket-book, 1837, by Sydow, we read—"The ancient peoples of the East worshipped the sun under the figure of some deity; its arrival at the end of its annual course, the winter solstice, was bewailed by the Egyptians as the death of Busiris; amongst the Ethiopians it was represented by Memnon, amongst the Persians by Mythras, amongst the Greeks by Bacchus, amongst the Babylonians by Adonis, amongst other nations by Atis. . . . In this manner all the various nations celebrated the death and resurrection of their respective deities, who were, in fact, nothing else but impersonifications of the sun. The myth of Adon-Hiram must be regarded as one of the oldest representations of the history of the sun-god, as introduced into the temples of the Masons, and ever since preserved by them in the original form." Here we once more find the Pantheism of the Manicheans under a new aspect.

But even this heathenish worship of Nature is impiously dressed up in, and disguised by names borrowed from, Christianity. When the Brethren dedicated their Lodge in Vienna to St Joseph, no one was further from their mind than the holy foster-father of the Saviour. They probably thought of the Spring Equinox, or, possibly, of their first patron, the Emperor Joseph II. For them the festival of St John the Baptist means the time when the sun reaches its meridian, the full plenitude of its power to enlighten and fructify. It is therefore a joyous festival for the Craft, as all the dwellers on the Rhine between Cologne and Coblenz can testify, when, on the recurrence of this day, the Freemasons' steamboat glides gaily by, with colours flying. The day of St John the Evangelist, December 27, is for them, on the contrary, a day of mourning, on account of the diminution of the sun's light and productive power, as it formerly was for the Phœnicians, who then commemorated the death and resurrection of their god Adonis. If the Brethren in bygone times called themselves Knights of St John, they did not know which of the two saints was their patron, but merely employed this holy name to screen themselves from the espionage and persecution of the outside world.<sup>1</sup>

The Leipzig Freemasons' paper, "for private circulation" (year 1850, No. 18, p. 137), gives a sketch of the proceedings on occasion of the winter solstice and new birth of light (Dec. 29, 1849) in the Lodge of True Friends of Unity at Brussels. The orator spoke as follows:—

"Freemasonry recognises only four principal feasts, the two equinoxes and the summer and winter solstices, i.e., the days which mark the divisions of time, and portion out the year into four almost equal periods. This determination is the result of long thought and deliberate conviction; for our festivals are not arbitrarily fixed by man, nor therefore liable to be altered and moved by him at his pleasure. No, my Brethren, our festivals are marked out in the heavens, they are indicated to us by the changing position of our earth in regard to the sun. The time has now come round when the brilliant orb which quickens all things is about to enter once more on his resplendent and royal course. It is Christmas-time! Glory to the great Architect of the Universe! All that lives, all that breathes, is bestirring itself anew, and preparing to shake off its temporary lethargy, its icebound sleep. Ought not grateful emotions to fill every heart at such a season, for, of all the festivals we celebrate, this is the greatest. On this day light is born again into the world!" . . . . In conclusion, I would point out to you that the striking allegory of the two-headed Janus,<sup>1</sup> represented to us by the two Johns, whose festivals coincide exactly with the times of the summer and winter solstice, with the birth and the victory of heaven's light—that this allegory, I say, offers to the philosopher, even more than to the savant, an inexhaustible field for diligent research." The writer adds in his report that this piece of magnificent rhetoric was received with repeated outbursts of applause, and that the orator was warmly complimented upon it by the Most Worshipful Master in person.

We find the Apostle St Paul, in his Epistle to the Romans, severely rebuking the heathens of old, and declaring them to be inexcusable, because, notwithstanding the many natural aids they possessed to attain to the knowledge of God, they turned aside from Him, their supreme and only Lord, choosing rather to worship creatures. And from this fact we may form some conception of what must be the immense weight of guilt attaching to an association which, standing as it does in the broad noonday of Christian revelation, voluntarily closes its eyes to the truth, strives, moreover, to involve the whole world in its conscious and deliberate apostasy from the faith of the only-begotten Son of God, and spares no effort of human cunning to beguile the minds of men and gain multitudes of adherents. This system of modern Paganism must of necessity contain within itself a neverfailing spring of hatred to Christian truth.<sup>1</sup> A certain vague agitation may be remarked stirring in all classes of society, which portends a future and frightful struggle between Ormuzd and Ariman, between light and darkness. The worst of it is, that those in whose hands power rests are either miserably enslaved and bound with a thousand chains, or are in abject fear of a monster far less formidable in reality than in appearance. So the one bold stroke which alone could promise deliverance is never dealt, and nations, good and honest at heart, go like sheep to the slaughter. Held in an iron grasp from which they cannot escape, they writhe in a long and painful death-struggle, one revolutionary paroxysm succeeding another while they wearily and anxiously look for a second deliverer who shall break the magic spell, and reinstate Christendom in the possession of her rights.

IV. From the doctrines of Pantheism and the external ceremonies of an Oriental worship of the sun and of nature, Freemasonry enters upon the fourth and worst stage of its conflict with God, i.e., the anti-theistic Worship of Humanity, which places man himself upon the throne of God. For if God be nature, and nature God, the highest thing in nature, Man, must consequently be the most perfect embodiment of the Divinity, must be himself God.

Every one of the above-named anti-religious systems has its own motto. Jewish Antitheism speaks incessantly of "Toleration," which is the watchword of the Craft while in its infancy; Deism of "Enlightenment," the watchword of the Craft when it has obtained open recognition; Pantheism of "Perpetual progress," the watchword of the Craft when it begins to rule; Humanism of the "Worship of humanity," the watchword of the Craft when it wields the rod of the tyrant. All these words are in their general meaning unexceptionable, and are therefore repeated by a simple-minded and unsuspecting public, which looks on them as something sacred. To the initiated only is revealed their true and full import. The pleasing word "Humanism," forms no exception. By the word humanitas the old Romans understood human nature at its best, advanced civilisation, polish and refinement of mind and heart; more particularly that general cultivation which every man ought to acquire before entering upon any course of professional study. Where can the nation or individual be found that would not fain be considered civilised? In the word itself no harm can be found; but thanks to the second meaning attached to it by Masonic ingenuity, the innocent exterior conceals a deadly poison, which, when circulating in the veins, stimulates man to open rebellion against God, and incites him to utter with his mouth the arrogant words of Lucifer—“I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God: I will sit in the mountain of the covenant, I will ascend above the height of the clouds; I will be like the Most High” (Isa. xiv. 13, 14); or rather, I will myself be the Most High. The following lines are in the same strain:—

And sunken nations pass away,
Arise, mankind, now dawns the day.”

In the pantheistic sense, man is the highest development of the all-pervading Divinity; in him that stage is reached in which matter becomes spiritual in its nature, and is elevated to a consciousness of its personal identity. Man, then, is a sovereign monarch; he is responsible to no one but himself for his actions; he is himself his own master. At most, as member of a body politic, he is bound to conform to those laws which are the expression of the general will, and in case of any infringement of them, to bear in silence the punishment due to him. As the highest embodiment of the divine element, he contains within himself the germ of boundless progress.

But the God of Christianity is, on the other hand, exalted far above Nature, and infinitely removed from the sphere of things created; by one word of His mouth He called all things into being; He created us men, and breathed into our bodies an immortal soul. He is our supreme Lord, Lord of body and soul, Lord in time and eternity. As our great Lawgiver, He lays upon us laws which cannot be transgressed with impunity, whilst leaving us at liberty to exercise free-will; by a good use of this free-will man may merit an eternal reward, but for him whose will rebels against that of his Maker an eternity of punishment is reserved. Furthermore, He has given us revelation to be an infallible judge in matters of faith, and upon our obedience to the decisions of this judge, He has made our eternal happiness to depend.

Against this God of Christianity the occult teaching of the Craft, acknowledging as it does no higher being than man himself, rises up in the bitterest animosity, and declaims against Him as an usurper from whose yoke man must free himself. This enables us to understand how a Freemason could utter words so unspeakably blasphemous as these—"Dieu c'est le mal;" how it was possible for the Libertaire to make use of the terms we have already quoted, and say that humanity must not allow itself to be checked in its career of endless progress by those barriers "on which the murderers of their kind have scrawled the name of God in letters of blood and mud."

This last phase of antitheism made a dramatic and legalised début on the public stage in the days when Freemasonry celebrated its triumph. In 1793 belief in God was a crime prohibited in France under pain of death, and the worship of reason was set up as the national cultus. On November 10th of the same year a prostitute might be seen in Paris exalted upon a triumphal car, a crucifix placed beneath her feet, conducted by an escort of statesmen and philosophers to the Cathedral of Notre Dame, there to be raised upon an altar, while incense was burnt and songs were sung in her honour. A like disgraceful scene was also enacted in other French towns. This deification of man with all that oppresses and degrades those who are unregenerate; this blasphemous social apostasy from God and from virtue; this recalling of the wildest times of Paganism, in which man is his own deity, was not an act perpetrated in a moment of passing intoxication, but a work planned long ago, and carried into execution when a suitable moment came. Freemasonry, the antipodes of Christianity, will give itself no rest until its theories have been once more put into practice, and spread over the face of the whole earth.

Here, then, we have the meaning of the terms "Humanitas," the "Worship of humanity," "Social civilisation," "Political progress," "Ennobled human nature," "Intellectual culture;" expressions daily made use of by the assailants of the Church as their war cry, when opposing the cross of Jesus Christ. We have already quoted so many passages from Masonic publications, exposing their sinister designs, that a few only can be introduced here; they will, however, amply suffice to prove the truth of our allegation.<sup>1</sup>

In the Freemasons' periodical, "for circulation amongst the Brethren" (Altenburg, 1823, vol. i. No. 1, p. 95 seq.), we find the following passage treating of the true object of the worship of the Craft:—"The idea of religion indirectly includes all men as men, but in order to comprehend this aright, a certain degree of cultivation is necessary, and unfortunately the over-weening egoism of the educated classes prevents their taking in so sublime a conception of mankind. For this reason our temples consecrated to the worship of humanity" (i.e., the Lodges of the higher grades) "can as yet be opened to only a few. We should indeed expose ourselves to a charge of idolatry were we to attempt to personify the moral idea of humanity in the way in which the Divinity is usually personified (!) . . . . On this account, therefore, it is advisable not to reveal the cultus of humanity to the eyes of the uninitiated, until at length the time shall come, when from east to west, from north to south, this lofty conception of humanity shall find a place in every breast, this worship alone shall prevail, and all mankind be gathered into one fold and one family."

Since man is God, it follows that all which is human is divine, and the more intrinsically human the more essentially divine. This maxim is the very soul of Masonic teaching, the "eritis sicut Dii" of the serpent in paradise, the ignis fatuus appearing under a thousand varying hues in the mythology of the ancients, in the mysterious rites of Secret Societies, in the Lodges of the Craft, and leading astray many who are made to believe that it is the brightest flame of heavenly wisdom. This is what self-knowledge, a word so suggestive of virtue, is intended to signify when uttered in the hearing of the Apprentice on his first "admission to the light." Brother N. J. Mouthaan says plainly, "We must live as gods. Is this a highflown hyperbole, a poetical exaggeration utterly devoid of truth? . . . . The spirit which animates us is an eternal spirit; it knows no division of time or individual existence. A sacred unity pervades and governs the wide firmament of heaven; it is our one calling, our one duty, our one God. Yes we are God! we ourselves are God. My brethren, do we understand this aright? Man is akin to God; in man dwells the same spirit as in God, this spirit is indivisible. Looking upon our spiritual nature, we men may be said to form part of the great whole, the great Being of God. The myths and legends, the beliefs of benighted nations, will all one day disappear before the consciousness that man himself is God. And why is mankind so slow to receive this truth? why are so many impediments placed in its way, so many pitfalls dug in its path? Simply because man, a creature of sense, has no desire, no ambition, to subdue his human nature, and obtain the mastery over his body. He who is conscious of his own divinity cannot breathe in this lower and stifling atmosphere, which is death to the soul. The man who feels himself to be God must live a life to which death cannot have access.”<sup>1</sup>

According to these views Christianity and the Christian state are outposts of the enemy which are already carried. The collective voice of the State must henceforth decide all questions of truth, since in it alone all power rests. But it is needful to advance cautiously, and step by step, because premature action might rouse the confessors of Christianity to a desperate conflict, and inaugurate a most undesirable series of martyrdoms. Hence the first thing is to erect a godless state, separation between Church and State being already presupposed, or, what is worst of all, the voice of the Church being completely silenced. Thus Humanism remains master of the situation, and can legislate as it pleases; and it will not fail to create a state hostile to God. Any one who appeals to a superior divine authority is guilty of treason against all that is highest and most God-like on earth, for the

State itself is God. Of course, where this system prevails, no time-honoured historical rights, if obnoxious to the public taste of the moment, have any chance of holding their ground ; they are swept away without scruple, one single vote being sufficient to turn the scale against them. That which the State decrees is alone the highest morality. "Law is the public conscience." Of natural rights there can be no question, as these presuppose a universal code of laws binding upon mankind, and a supernatural lawgiver. Moreover, such would inconveniently limit the absolute sovereignty of man in the State ; that is, the sovereignty of the nation, the will of the people forming an irresponsible tribunal before whose decisions the most ancient charters are nothing more than waste-paper.

The moral law of this system is limited to the precept, "Follow the dictates of nature,"- sequere naturam. Here again we meet with a principle to all appearance completely harmless, for certain ancient teachers of morality made the highest virtue of man to consist in following his nobler impulses ; and even the Christian is ready to own that grace does not destroy nature, but rather purifies, strengthens, and elevates it. But the Masonic worship of humanity, based as it is upon Pantheism, recognises no fundamental distinction between good and evil, regarding the practice of mortification and self-denial as contemptible folly on the part of the Christian ; for if man himself is divine, the impulses of his heart must also be divine, and what usurper shall dare to control the exercise of his prerogative in this respect? All that is human is good: so the vices and misdeeds of Jupiter, Juno, Venus, Hercules, and Mars, are to be commended!

The humanistic morality of Freemasonry is nowhere more honestly exposed than by Brother Helvetius in his two works "On Mind" ("De l'Esprit," Paris, 1793), and "On Man" ("De l'Homme," Paris, 1797).<sup>1</sup> Born in 1715, he showed himself throughout his whole life, and in all his writings, a worthy member of the Craft. He died at Paris in 1771, where two years later the Freemasons honoured his memory with much ceremony and solemnity.<sup>2</sup> We must give a short extract from the first-named of his works, in order that the reader may form some idea of the dark abyss of moral depravity into which he would allow mankind to sink.

According to Helvetius, the motive by which our

conduct is to be regulated is one which appeals to nature and the senses. He makes the moral character of the individual, as of the nation, to depend on chance impressions, on education, and the forms of government. He denies the existence of abstract virtue and vice. What is beneficial to all in general may be called virtue ; what is prejudicial, vice and sin. Here the voice of Interest alone has to speak ; each one of us falls in most promptly with those ideas which harmonise best with his own inclination and advantage ; errors and faults arise only from our inability to perceive in what our true interest consists. Individual self-sacrifice promotes the common good, and therefore the exploits of warriors meet with universal praise ; narrow self-seeking is injurious to the community, and therefore cowardice is a disgrace. In regard to mankind at large, no action can be exclusively good or evil ; the wish to benefit the whole world is one which can never be fulfilled, because the interest of one nation is always at variance with that of another. Passions are only the intensified expression of self-interest in the individual, therefore they are never pernicious, but, on the contrary, necessary ; to destroy them is to injure the interests of the community. The strongest passions inspire the noblest deeds ; witness the Dutch people, who, when hatred and revenge urged them to action, achieved great triumphs, and made their country a powerful and glorious name. And as sensual love is universally acknowledged to afford happiness, purity must be condemned as pernicious, the marriage-bond done away with, and children declared to be the property of the State.<sup>1</sup> That will be the best Constitution in which individual interests will be promoted, sensual gratification enhanced, and the interests of the many made identical with those of the few by means of a wisely-ordered code of laws. Such is the system of morality which humanistic teaching proposes to us.

By doctrines like these, which, far from having been disavowed by the Craft, procured for their author a solemn tribute of respect some time after his death, Helvetius cuts at the root of all morality, and proves that apostasy in a Christian people is infinitely more terrible than ancient Paganism, notwithstanding its attendant train of evils. And a creature such as he dared, in his hate of God and eagerness to serve the devil, to overwhelm the Christian Church with blasphemous accusations, charging her with excusing crimes to serve her own ends, and with making saints of those who have done most for her interests; accusing her of requiring self-denial on the part of her followers, and thus doing violence to human nature; of enjoining humility, and by this means encouraging meanness and idleness (for does not pride alone give energy and courage?); of extolling chastity as the highest perfection, and, finally, insisting on the indissolubility of marriage; an intolerable burden though this be, to which is far preferable either marriage as in Africa, where a couple may live together for three years before making a final decision, or the other alternative of liberty to exchange wives, which furnishes a means of rewarding men who have deserved well of their country, of inciting magistrates to the exercise of justice, and soldiers to the exhibition of valour. Our author further states that the religions of Paganism were not only less pernicious in their influence than was Christianity, but that they did far more than the latter system to promote intellectual advancement and moral courage; that the saints were ignorant, whimsical, good-for-nothing beings, enjoying in their convents a monopoly of wealth; finally, that the Jesuits have ever been the most terrible scourge inflicted upon the nations of the earth.<sup>1</sup> On this account it is indispensable to deprive the Church of all power, and this can only be effected by means of obstinate resistance to her encroachments, and by legislative and educational reform.

In these theories, which, unfortunately, have not been allowed to remain simple theories, we find the paradise awaiting the worshippers of humanity already pointed out: man's highest reward is to consist in sensual gratification; that is to say, in transgressions of the sixth commandment. All the religious ceremonies of Freemasonry tend in this same direction. The Festival of St John the Evangelist which falls in the winter, corresponds to that of Isis and Astarte; the Feast of St John the Baptist, kept in the summer, replaces that of Adonis and Osiris. In the Vienna Freemasons' Journal (3d year, No. 4, p. 78 seq.), we find the following amongst other things:—"The name of Adonis is too sacred to be handled by the ignorant critic; it is the link which, if it does not immediately connect the Samothracian mysteries with our occult rites, at least brings the two into close proximity. To recognise in the principal deity of classic antiquity, especially of the Samothracian mysteries, the Adon-Hiram whose death Freemasons can never sufficiently bewail, appears to me no far-fetched idea, but one which bears a strong stamp of truth, one which my Brethren will hail with satisfaction, one in support of which strong proofs are not lacking. I do not hesitate to assert that the history of Busiris-Bacchus, including all the attendant incidents, may be justly laid before Freemasons as a counterpart to the sad career of our adored Adon-Hiram; and I rejoice to be able to show you the classic work I have discovered under that figurative representation which was in ancient mythology an emblem of fertility. I need not remind you that our false ideas of modesty must all be set aside. The desire to find truth is a noble impulse, the search after it a sacred avocation, and ample field for this is offered by both the mysterious rites peculiar to the Craft, and those of the Goddess Isis, adored in our temples as the wisest and fairest of deities. Is it not from this that the name of Ision, applied to our temple, is derived?"

If we recall the feasts of Isis as celebrated in Egypt, and the hideous orgies held in her name at the time of Julius Cæsar and other Roman Emperors, orgies which even at that period excited such disgust that it was thought fit to suppress them; if we remember the conduct of Claudius on one of those Isis' nights, we feel that our acquaintance with these mysteries need be carried no further.

The Astræa, an organ of Freemasonry (year 1848, p. 50), reports the following passage from a festive speech delivered by a high dignitary of the Craft, Councillor Bechstein, before an assembly of the Brethren and Sisters on this Feast of Roses<sup>1</sup> (St John Baptist's day). "To-day we meet adorned with roses in the halls of our sacred temples" (the Lodge); "adorned with roses we stand around its altar. We wear an emblem common to all Masons, which decks every breast and gladdens every eye, and is fraught with a deep and hidden meaning. This is the queen of flowers; the rose, the emblem of beauty and of virginal charms; the flower of love, springing from the

<sup>1</sup> "The Feast of St John is the Feast of Roses of Freemasonry, the festival of loving union" (in a sensual sense). These words are taken from an oration delivered at Leipzig. bosom of the earth, as the goddess of beauty sprang from the foam of the sea." At the distribution of roses to the Brethren and Sisters (Astræa, 1842-43, p. 108), the following verses were sung, in which the word love is certainly used in no Christian sense :—

“ Masons, take these fragrant roses,
Take and bind them to your breast ;
To some, not nearly all, is known
The meaning by those flowers exprest.

Winning grace and fragrance sweet
Lie within their half-closed form,
But the full-blown chalice offers Draughts that take our hearts by storm.

Innocence her modest crown,
Love the heart-shaped leaves declare ;
To the sons of earth proclaiming Praise of Him who made her fair.

Whilst seated at his Master's side ;
Learnt the tender lambs to cherish,
Teacher wise and faithful guide.

He of love the living image
Looks on all with kindly pleasure ;
Speaks to all with words of mildness,
Wishing all to share His treasure.

<sup>1</sup> St John the Evangelist is here Isis under a Christian mask, and therefore must be taken to represent the feminine sex. See Eckert, “Die Frage,” &c. That the Holy Redeemer should be found in such company is, we suppose, a source of edification to the simple-minded Mason ; the initiated see the blasphemy, and are edified too in their way.

Brethren, if throughout creation
 Love is life and life is love ;
 If to love alone is given,
 Earth below and heaven above ;

If made by love and made for love,
 Man begins his life on earth,
 Following out its sacred impulse,
 Thus he learns his truest worth.

When love, the sacred spark divine,
 Brightly burns in every heart ;
 When mankind wakes up rejoicing,
 And illusions all depart ;

Then the Mason's course will prove
 A track of light o'er moor and fen ;
 Then is love's most glorious triumph ;
 Love shall hold high festival then."

On the opening of the Lodge for women at Weimar, on St John's Day 1843, the Master of the Lodge thus addressed his fair audience :—" Yes, my dear Sisters, we are indeed your Brethren. We cherish towards you feelings of the sincerest devotion, remembering, as each one of the Brothers here present to-day cannot fail to do, the words of warning which the Most Worshipful Master pronounces each time that he hands the white gloves to a candidate who seeks admission into the Craft. Moreover, every Mason knows the meaning of the second pair of gloves, which the Master is bound to present ; a meaning that principally refers to you, beloved sisters."

Similar expressions of an erotic nature are constantly recurring at the festive gatherings of the Brethren, sometimes in the form of innuendoes, sometimes without any such disguise.

We give a literal translation of a poetic toast, taken from the Almanac for Dutch Freemasons 1872, p. 228, of which frequent mention has been made:—

“Come, Brethren, remember your lessons of yore !
Up, Brothers, and shoulder your muskets once more !
For Wisdom first fire, whose time-honoured name
Is a beacon, enlightening the world with its flame !
Then again, fire again, salute masculine might,
The mainstay of life that makes all hardships light ;
But let the last volley surpass all the rest,
In honour of Beauty, that gives life its true zest.”

From all this it may easily be gathered that even the motto of the three lowest grades, Wisdom, Strength, and Beauty, conceals beneath the surface a meaning which inculcates immorality.

The paragraphs we have quoted will suffice to show that the heaven of humanistic Freemasonry is a very carnal one. From first to last the Craft is true to its character of an open enemy to God and to His kingdom. Who, therefore, can wonder that the most heroic efforts of Christianity scarcely suffice to keep down the rising flood of moral depravity in education and in literature, in the theatre and the press, in public and private life? At the same time, we see verified the apostle's words, when he says that God delivers up to shameful affections those who give themselves over to heathenism (Rom. i. 26). When man in the pride of his heart endeavours to seat himself on the throne of God, he loses by the fact of doing so the last remnants of his native nobility, and having become "like to horse and mule, which have no understanding," sinks into the quagmire of vice and degradation.

The father of lies has frequently been compared by the early theologians to an ape, who imitates the actions of God. He has, in fact, erected a temple of his own, in opposition to the divinely-founded Church, and gathered together a band of unhappy dupes as worshippers in his sanctuary. He rules with an iron sceptre, and strikes in pieces all who dare to profess allegiance to the God of love. But the work of the spirit of darkness cannot last, and this consoling conviction gives us the joyful hope that the temples of the Craft will ere long crumble, and that mankind will return to the one true and holy Church, who alone can make her children happy.

But should God in His Providence permit the schemes of darkness to triumph for awhile, and the age of martyrs to return once more, then the Church—at least if we interpret aright the signs of the times—will not fail to exhibit the same heroic courage of obedience unto death which was displayed in the first three centuries of her struggle with Paganism, a courage never equalled by warriors fighting for earthly glory alone. Those who fall in the unequal strife will, in very deed, be so many conquerors; their blood will be a pledge of the final triumph of the Cross. It may be that the kings of the earth will perhaps ask, in the trouble of their heart, "Shall our people give their money and offer their sons for nothing better than that the will of the Craft may be done?" In this case the day of reckoning would not be far off. But this solution, however, is not one which we would wish to see; rather do we send up earnest supplications to heaven that it may please God to open eyes that are blinded, and soften hearts that are hardened, so that the troublous times of confusion and rebellion may cease at last, and Christ be all in all. Then shall the words of Charlemagne be inscribed once more in letters of gold upon our senate-houses and churches, "Christ lives; Christ reigns; Christ triumphs!"

CHAPTER IX.

POLITICAL AND ANTIRELIGIOUS AGITATION.

- I. SPEECH of the Belgian Brother and Grand Master VERHAEGEN, at the Festival of the Summer Solstice, in the Grand Orient of Brussels.— (Tracé des travaux de la grande fête solsticiale nationale, célébrée par le Gr. Or. de Belgique ; le 24 J. du 4 M., l'an de la V. L.—vraie lumière— 5854. Bruxelles, établissement typographique du F. Henri Samuel, 1854, pp. 13-19.)

THE following speech affords evidence of how eminently political and anti-religious are all the efforts of the Secret Society. It is one of many delivered by Verhaegen, who afterwards came to such an unhappy end, and it was printed by the unanimous request of all the Masons present, as a magnificent rhetorical "construction." We omit the introduction as unimportant:—

“ . . . Events have recently occurred in the profane world claiming our careful attention, and our newly-elected Grand Commander has expressed the opinion that they are not without a special significance for Freemasons. It cannot be that numbers of devoted, enlightened, and patriotic men, friends of progress and of liberty, should meet in so many places all over the country" (in the Lodges) "without having any definite aim, or producing any definite results. It would indeed be no small disgrace to Freemasonry, did it content itself with barren efforts, while the enemy is everywhere organising his forces, while the sinister league" (Catholic) "of ignorance and oppression spreads its nets abroad in the darkness, and adds daily to its ominous and ever-increasing power by a system of terrorism and selfishness. I am well aware that on entering upon such a topic as this I shall awaken the fears and scruples of the timid. It will be alleged that this is perilous ground, of special danger for Freemasons, since our statutes" (that is, those intended for the lower grades, and for the eyes of the outside world) "forbid us to take part in any religious or political discussion. My Brethren, this subject must be thoroughly sifted once for all; and in presence of the unwelcome dilemma of either remaining completely silent, or violating its own laws, Freemasonry must at length speak out boldly as to the principles it means to adopt, and the course of conduct it intends to pursue.

"First of all, we feel no hesitation in stating that on many occasions Freemasons have overstept this barrier, and have taken an active part in political struggles. And since the triumph of our cause has been joyfully hailed by the whole nation, proving how many are found throughout the length and breadth of the land to sympathise with the League, who will dare to blame our conduct?<sup>1</sup> To do so would be to take a false view of history, and deny the greatness of the service we have rendered to the country.

“In addition to this, we are justified in saying that Freemasonry, on the occasion referred to, obeyed a plain call of duty, and that under similar circumstances it would do well to pursue a like course of action in the future.

“One remark I must be allowed to make, namely, that the prohibition in question (concerning political and religious agitation) is not to be gathered from the general statutes of the Order, where not the slightest mention of it is to be found. If the original authors of those constitutions had intended to make the aforesaid prohibition absolutely binding, they would have inserted it amongst the statutes as a positive law. But as this restriction is only indicated in the special rule of the Grand Orient, it is merely to be taken as having a relative importance. Besides, it can be at any time altered or set aside at the request of five deputies.

Orient concur as to the advisability of setting aside this restriction, it would be childish on our part to attach any value to it. Thus we find ourselves at liberty, theoretically and practically, to regard this law as virtually a dead letter.

“Were Freemasonry compelled to confine its action to the limits of the narrow circle which some would prescribe for it, I ask further, Of what use would its vast organisation then be, and the extensive development to which it has attained? If its life is to be cramped in this manner, we had better close our temples at once; outside we shall find ample means of accomplishing the miserable remnant of our task. What I say here has been repeated a hundred times over by the most enlightened, the most devoted, the most valued of our Masons. I am only their echo; I merely state aloud what each man thinks in his secret heart. Any one, therefore, who is of opinion that it is an infringement of Masonic law thus to explain away the rule in question, may, hearing this, take heart again.

“If I interrogate the past history of our Order, I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that Freemasonry has ever been a heedful watchman, guarding the Vessel of the State as it struggles in the surging sea of politics. Does it not, amid the storm and darkness, kindle the friendly beacon to show that rocks are nigh? Does it not, when danger threatens, run up the signal of alarm? Does not its whole history bear the same testimony? Has not the Craft, in the hour of need, ever proved a fortress and bulwark against the encroachments of error and deceit" (i.e., the Christian Church and Christian State) "from whatever quarter the attack may come? And what she has done in the past may she not do, under like circumstances, in the future?"

"It appears to me that there can be no doubt on the subject, and the Grand Commander and the Grand Orient think as I do. Brethren, the hour of danger has now come, the enemy threatens, let us be up and doing. The call to arms has sounded; do you not feel that there is something menacing in the very air? The voice of conscience seems to be stifled, treachery shows itself with unblushing effrontery, and in broad daylight incense is burnt on the altars of those false gods, shameful egoism and craven timidity" (the Christian religion). "Enemies destitute of all sense of honour, devoured by a vulgar and insatiable ambition, dare to dream of political omnipotence, of consciences enslaved, of the overthrow of all our cherished rights. Everywhere our foes are organising their forces, everywhere they proclaim aloud that to take a part in the politics of the day is their bounden duty, their indisputable right.<sup>1</sup> Under cover of works of benevolence, they are arraying their hosts in order for battle; they fight under the ægis of our own principles, the words liberty, toleration, charity, and all other virtues are ever on their lips. The Society of St Vincent of Paul inscribes on its banners the noble motto 'Humanity,' but in the mouths of its members this word is a mockery. And in face of these continual advances" (of the Christians), "on the eve of a decisive struggle, are Freemasons to hide themselves like cowards in their temples, and say, 'Let us keep quiet; we must not have anything to do with politics?'

"No, my Brethren! let us no longer compel Freemasonry to foul her own nest, and voluntarily acquiesce in this unjust forfeiture of her rights.

"In consequence of this suicidal policy, which I do not know how severely enough to condemn, we are rushing to our own destruction, we repudiate our whole past. Let us not bequeath to our children the disgrace of an apostasy such as this! Let not futurity have to blush for this our shameful present time. Let us at any rate be assured of one truth, that if our Order lays upon us a most sacred and lofty mission, it cannot at the same time deprive us of the means which are necessary for the fulfilment of that mission. It would indeed appear paradoxical if, while entertaining so high an opinion of us on the one hand, it should, on the other, show such degrading mistrust of us.

"It is now high time, my Brethren, to call out

the same testimony? Has not the Craft, in the hour of need, ever proved a fortress and bulwark against the encroachments of error and deceit" (i.e., the Christian Church and Christian State) "from whatever quarter the attack may come? And what she has done in the past may she not do, under like circumstances, in the future?"

"It appears to me that there can be no doubt on the subject, and the Grand Commander and the Grand Orient think as I do. Brethren, the hour of danger has now come, the enemy threatens, let us be up and doing. The call to arms has sounded; do you not feel that there is something menacing in the very air? The voice of conscience seems to be stifled, treachery shows itself with unblushing effrontery, and in broad daylight incense is burnt on the altars of those false gods, shameful egoism and craven timidity" (the Christian religion). "Enemies destitute of all sense of honour, devoured by a vulgar and insatiable ambition, dare to dream of political omnipotence, of consciences enslaved, of the overthrow of all our cherished rights. Everywhere our foes are organising their forces, everywhere they proclaim aloud that to take a part in the politics of the day is their bounden duty, their indisputable right.<sup>1</sup> Under cover of works of benevolence, they are arraying their hosts in order for battle; they fight under the ægis of our own principles, the words liberty, toleration, charity, and all other virtues are ever on their lips. The Society of St Vincent of Paul inscribes on its banners the noble motto 'Humanity,' but in the mouths of its members this word is a mockery. And in face of these continual advances" (of the Christians), "on the eve of a decisive struggle, are Freemasons to hide themselves like cowards in their temples, and say, 'Let us keep quiet; we must not have anything to do with politics?'

"No, my Brethren! let us no longer compel Freemasonry to foul her own nest, and voluntarily acquiesce in this unjust forfeiture of her rights.

"In consequence of this suicidal policy, which I do not know how severely enough to condemn, we are rushing to our own destruction, we repudiate our whole past. Let us not bequeath to our children the disgrace of an apostasy such as this! Let not futurity have to blush for this our shameful present time. Let us at any rate be assured of one truth, that if our Order lays upon us a most sacred and lofty mission, it cannot at the same time deprive us of the means which are necessary for the fulfilment of that mission. It would indeed appear paradoxical if, while entertaining so high an opinion of us on the one hand, it should, on the other, show such degrading mistrust of us.

"It is now high time, my Brethren, to call out

all our resources. If you cast your eyes around, you will see that whilst fools and knaves of every description are hastening to make friends with the party of reaction, the party of opposition is altogether lacking in unity. Nowhere can a central point be found powerful enough to draw together the men of the future, nowhere a banner under which they can all meet, although, in spite of varying shades of opinion, they in the main love and desire but one thing, and that thing is—"progress" (i.e., revolution). "Therefore, by some means or other, let those whose intentions are good form themselves into a united body; for they are the friends of truth, the apostles of what is good and beautiful, they form the brilliant twin-constellation which enlightens the moral and material world in its two-fold aspiration after knowledge and happiness.<sup>1</sup>

"But what more is needed than what we have at hand? It exists already, and you know it well. It is this phalanx of upright and enlightened men, who are preparing the way for the future, or who give reality to the present, men who open a free arena where all that is good in the opinions of diverse parties may meet on common ground. And who is she, the noble mother of so numerous and widespread a family—who, after the example of Christ, says to all pure and honest

souls, 'Peace to men of good will!'—who, in a word, is that parent alone able to solve the great problem of the present, and quell the storms which may, perhaps, be in store for ourselves in the womb of the future? You guess who she is, Brethren; you recognise her in the loftiness of her nature and the omnipotence of her strength. Freemasonry is her name!!!! . . . .<sup>1</sup>

"But we must go to the root of the matter. It is not enough to exclaim in a moment of enthusiasm, 'We are strong, we are all-powerful, we cannot fail to conquer!' Let us take good heed as to what we are about. We shall be strong if we are united, powerful if the object we have in view is clearly defined, victorious if the principles that actuate us are fixed and enlightened.

"We must know, and I emphasise the word, what it is we really want; and, above all, we must know both what the needs of society are—a knowledge of which can only be obtained by conscientious study of those needs—and what the laws of social economy ought to be—a discovery only to be made by patient and intelligent research. We must know what we really want! and, knowing it, our wills must be united, firm, and fearless. Essential to us above all is unity of purpose, a unity that cannot be shaken; for this alone will entitle us to conquer, will ensure us the victory.

“I will sum up all in a word. The motto, I say, which it is incumbent on Freemasons to adopt in the present exigency—one, too, which they would do well to adhere to and follow out in future times, is this—Know what you want, and want what you know.”

“A few more words in explanation, and I have done. Know what it is you want. . . . . This is the indispensable preliminary for the work; every Mason must undertake it for himself, every Lodge must propose it as the object of its labours. If we are once set free from the restrictions imposed by Article 135, every Mason will feel that he has a right to take an interest in everything, that it is his duty to inquire into everything, and form a definite opinion, both as a member of the Craft and as a citizen of the State, on all the questions of the day, whether moral or material, social or philosophical” (i.e., political or religious). “In a word, let Freemasonry boldly announce the divine principle—which is not only a sacred right but a bounden duty, the charter of our public and most cherished prerogatives, sealed with the blood of martyrs” (revolutionary ones)—“I mean liberty of research. This gives the Mason an infallible guide for the direction of his conduct: he knows what he wants.”

“And then, in the co-operation of his Brethren, in the mighty organisation of the Craft, in the true and solid unity prevailing there, the Mason will find that strength which concord imparts, whereby alone great things can be achieved. And since he not only hopes, but knows for certain, that he may reckon upon the triumph of those views to which he clings with invincible tenacity, nothing that he can do will be left undone to bring about their speedy realisation. He will want what he knows.

“Then let all those come on who hurl anathemas against the Craft” (i.e., the Pope and the Bishops), “let them make ready for the battle; with these deadly foes of man’s true welfare” (atheist social-democracy), “who have ever striven to keep the human intelligence in swaddling-bands, the sons of true light will know how to grapple; they will cast them for ever into outer darkness.”

Notwithstanding the omission of several passages in the report, we think the speech before us is sufficiently intelligible. It was greeted with immense applause, and the proposal it contains was passed as a resolution; that is, it was resolved to extend to the members of the lower grades a liberty long exercised to a great extent by those of the eighteenth and thirty-eighth grades—liberty to agitate on behalf of religious, social, and political revolution.

II. SPEECH delivered by the Grand Orator, Brother JULIUS BOURLARD, in the Grand Orient of Brussels, on occasion of the same festivities.— (Tracé, &c., pp. 30–38.)

“ . . . . My Brethren of the Grand Orient, and you, my Brethren, who have come hither from all the Lodges of the country, in order to be present at the imposing ceremony of to-day, I can readily imagine how anxious you all are to hear more in detail the future plan of operations for the Grand Orient, and I doubt not you will receive full and satisfactory information respecting the manner in which every dignitary proposes to co-operate in carrying out the great task of Freemasonry.

“I will expound to you without reserve the principles by which I am actuated, and the desires I have most at heart; laying before you my deepest convictions with the greatest candour and openness. My Brethren, who can shut his eyes to the fact that it is of absolute importance for Freemasonry at this time to take the field, and put forth all her activity? (qu'il faut que la Maçonnerie soit active, qu'elle soit militante). Have not we, a body of thoughtful and enlightened men,<sup>1</sup> been for years obliged to remain passive, unable to make practical use of the ideas which inspire us, unable to carry them out into action? compelled to witness the indefinite postponement of those results which both heart and mind eagerly anticipated? Now the very same day which sees the question proposed must see it solved; all must unite with heart and soul in order that Freemasonry may act, that it may execute its designs, that it may achieve its triumphs. Brethren, I desire progress in the widest and most comprehensive sense of the word. I desire intellectual cultivation, moral perfection. I desire improvement in the material condition of so many millions of mankind who are all our brethren, of so many unhappy beings who dwell with us under the same heaven, and cultivate with us the same earth. Yes, since every being upon the earth is a part of the same universal matter as myself, and contains besides within him a spark of the great and all-pervading Spirit, I desire that this divine spark may in each and all grow and kindle into a vivid flame, that every created intelligence, from the highest to the lowest in the social scale, may be elevated and enlightened, that every heart may throb with a glad sense of existence; in a word, that man may become God. (Applause.)

<sup>1</sup> Who can fail to recognise here that atheistic social-democracy which is the Mason's ideal? But in order to avert suspicion from itself, the Craft was cunning enough, in accordance with its habitual tactics, to accuse the clergy of socialistic schemes, and shameless enough to speak to a credulous public of a black International League.

moral progress. I desire the whole world to know and confess that there is a moral law which governs the universe, which is the same in all lands, amongst all peoples, and that this moral law forms the true religion of nations. (Renewed applause.)<sup>1</sup> I desire that all should learn to pay due respect to the just man, and that the upright should everywhere attain to the position of dignity which he deserves to fill.<sup>2</sup> This is my idea of progress, of moral improvement. How easily might all this be carried into effect, if only the opinions, the plans, the institutions of Freemasonry were entrusted with the guidance of national education. (Prolonged cheering.)<sup>3</sup>

“Let us pause here, and philosophise for a moment. Here we will take our rest until we have formed our judgment and fixed on our resolutions, in order to be ready for prompt and decisive action when the fitting moment shall arrive.

“And I would appeal to you, Brethren, and ask whether, if we are thoroughly penetrated with these opinions, if they are dear to us as our own lives, we can for a single moment allow an article in the rules of the Grand Orient to stand in our way, or regard it as an insuperable obstacle to the accomplishment of those holy and noble desires which inflame our heart. Can we honestly see in Article 135 a regulation prohibiting, under any circumstances whatever, the introduction of religious or political topics in our Lodges? Would not this be tantamount to condemning us to a life of inactivity, subsisting on theories alone? In such a case our wisest course would be to shut up our Temples without delay. What is the meaning of a prohibition to occupy ourselves with any religious or political problems? What are these problems? They are the realisation of our ideal, the carrying into operation and putting into practice the views and designs of the Craft. But as soon as we leave theory, and come to facts and realities, a clause of our rule is thrown in our teeth; we are indeed free to form opinions on these subjects, but must on no account presume to act on our opinions. (Applause.)

“The earnestness of our purpose and the purity of our intentions are, it is true, admitted on all sides; but we are told to remain behind the screen, and not seek to extend the results of our studies and observations beyond it. From the mere statement of a false position such as this we must inevitably draw the unalterable conclusion that it is not simply the right, but also the duty of Freemasonry to occupy itself with political and religious questions, since by this means alone can we succeed in putting our theories into practice. (Great applause.)

“And I ask you further, my Brethren, the right of free inquiry being conceded to us, under what conditions is this concession made?”

“Liberty of research is permitted us in theory, but at every step they tell us we are interfering in affairs of State, in politics, and in religion; that is to say, in the process of self-aggrandisement, which some people pursue in the name of God, and dignify with the title of religion. And this is termed free inquiry! For my part, I would briefly say to all who would deny me liberty to range at will throughout the whole realm of thought, ‘I am a man; everything that concerns humanity concerns me, and is full of interest to me.’

“But, my Brethren, let there be no mistake as to what is, in my opinion, to be understood by this active and continual intervention of Freemasonry in politics and religion. I am far from wishing the Grand Orient to imagine that the quota I shall contribute in my character of Speaker will be to converse daily upon the politics of the hour, and certain current religious topics. On the contrary, we must be most careful to steer clear of everything that is petty or personal. Exciting discussions about the conduct of this man or the other would only bring about that state of things which, of all others, it is our duty most strenuously to endeavour to avoid—dissension and mutual dislikes.

But all the great fundamental principles of politics—everything which refers to the organisation, formation, and life of a State, these are what most prominently concern ourselves; these come into our special sphere; these must be duly tested in the crucible of reason and intelligence. (Applause.)

“But if the Ministry should propose to the country a new scheme of popular education, then I would cry out, ‘That is a matter for us Freemasons! The question of education belongs to me; it is for me to investigate it, for me to discover the solution!’ (Fresh applause.)

“Were the Ministry to bring before Parliament a bill for the reorganisation of benevolent institutions, I should raise my voice again, and say, ‘That is my business as a Freemason! It is my business to control public charities! This branch of the administration must not be allowed to pass into unworthy hands, which will abuse it, to the injury of the cause we have constantly at heart. Leave, therefore, the question of organising charity to me; it must be well weighed, worked out, and put in practice, according to our convictions and the spirit of our Order.’ (Prolonged cheers.)

“Furthermore, we are bound to make our voice heard if any Minister puts a false construction on the rules of international hospitality.<sup>1</sup> Should

<sup>1</sup> Much more ruthlessly would they desire to see the hospitality of the Belgian soil outraged in the event of its affording a shelter to the members of any of the Religious Orders. In such a case, even an ostensibly Catholic Ministry dares not insist on the maintenance of the territorial rights of his country.

the great principle of fraternity be overstrained, and the hospitality of the Belgian soil be abused, on the plea of considerations which the rights of nations neither warrant nor admit, then rally round me, O Masons! (Universal expressions of assent.)

“And if at last the day comes—a day perhaps not far distant—when the nation itself has to adopt decisions of the most important nature;<sup>1</sup> if, on the eve of a great and momentous crisis—one perhaps already imminent—Belgium is called upon finally to determine what position she will take up, what part she will play, then away with you, all you Masons who would tell me that I am to have nothing to do with politics! I shall myself summon to my side all those who are faithful and devoted to their Order. I shall call on them to cast aside all anxious fears, and proceed with me first to search out, and afterwards publish abroad, what it behoves our dear and glorious country to do, in order to maintain her position at the head of European progress. (Here the speaker was interrupted by prolonged and stormy applause.)

“I must apologise to you, my Brethren, for having allowed myself to be thus carried away by my feelings; but I think this expression of our sentiments must have been a relief to the minds of all. You will forgive me, I am sure, for having perhaps trespassed too long on your kind attention. (No, no.)

<sup>1</sup> It appears that in this passage the speaker reckons on the eventual accession of Belgium to the universal social and democratic republic prophesied for the future.

“With regard to religion, my Brethren, do not imagine that I shall ever bring forward for debate in the Grand Orient, or within the narrower limits of our Temples, either dogmatic questions or scholastic propositions; such, for instance, as the weighty question of Transubstantiation. (Laughter.) Nor shall I take into my own hand the dissecting-knife to investigate these obscure points, to which the severe rule of former times, forbidding interference in religious matters, probably had reference. But if my Lords the Bishops issue pastorals, ostensibly containing Lenten regulations, but really inculcating a deep and cunning policy; if establishments professedly of a religious nature, but in my opinion nothing else than schools of idleness—(expressions of assent)—settle themselves all over the country; if crowds of healthy, vigorous adults take the bread out of the mouths of our poor and consume it in indolence, bread which should be the reward of honest toil; if these things are so, then, I say, it is high time for us all, and for me especially, to occupy ourselves with religious matters, and with the conventual question; to grapple with them boldly, and subject them to a careful scrutiny. And the country must take the law into its own hands, employing force if necessary, in order to cleanse itself from this hateful leprosy.<sup>1</sup> Let Freemasonry, therefore, exert untir-

ing activity to get rid of these useless converts, these homes of idlers." (Bravo!)

"Even in the middle of the nineteenth century, in the year 1854, we hear of new miracles being noised abroad; we learn that the Belgian people have a new saint held up to them for veneration, a certain St Babola (sic), who rises from his grave, and calls on the Belgian nation to procure his canonisation. Is not one tempted in such a case to disbelieve the testimony of one's senses? However, it is really true, and took place quite recently in my native town of Mons, where the Lodge of Parfaite Union holds its sittings. Yes, new saints do indeed make their appearance day by day, and are, at the very time I speak, receiving from the Jesuits exaggerated honours; at the same time the nation at large is told to seek the cure of its maladies in the waters of La Salette. Now, then, answer me, 'Is Freemasonry to take part in religious matters; or is she not? Must we not all unite to suppress abuses such as these?'

". . . . And now a word respecting the manner in which we must really desire what we know we have need of. Above all things, we must manifest our desires by conscientious labour within our Lodges, by united study, and by the subsequent employment of legitimate means for the realisation of those principles unately, been put into execution only too often. Freemasonry is, however, not afraid of the idleness, but of the activity, of the Religious Orders; this is why it hates the Jesuits, whom no one ever accused of idleness.

which are established by common consent. And I hope the press will not fail to fulfil a part at least of its mission, by diffusing in a popular form the truths of Freemasonry. When I see how the Jesuits invariably erect a printing-press close to their houses, and set up an office, whence they issue some mischievous periodical, I say, let us do likewise. Let us establish side by side with our Temples this powerful organ—alike legitimate and constitutional—the press, and make it speak in the cause of truth, as it has already often spoken in defence of falsehood and deceit. (Boisterous cheering.)

“Finally, how are we to accomplish what we desire? By means of action, namely, by being under all circumstances ever at our post, ready to wrestle with our adversaries. Wherever there is good” (i.e., evil) “to be done, whenever opportunity for usefulness presents itself, at all times and in all places, whether in his private or public capacity, each one of us must ever be the Freemason. The Craft must be represented in all official posts, in all committees for public charity or poor relief, everywhere keeping watch, and, if need be, fighting for the truth.”

allege that it is only in Belgium that the Craft makes such rapid advances. This opinion is quite an erroneous one. Its principles are the same everywhere, only in some countries it is necessary to preserve a stricter disguise and closer secrecy, leaving all action to the select class which constitutes the core of the Order. But since in Belgium such circumspection can be dispensed with, on account of the nature of the Constitution, and for another reason we prefer not to mention, Freemasonry may speak out boldly. The publications of the Belgian Lodges are therefore, of all others, the most important and the most trustworthy.

INTERNATIONAL LEAGUE.

THIS Congress was to have been held at Brussels in August 1865, and was to have consisted of workmen from England, France, Germany, Italy, Belgium, &c.

The Paris Lodge, Temple des Familles, under the direction of Brother Gamier, accepted the following proposal made by Brother Fribourg (a Jew), a member of the Lodge Avenir, and the Paris correspondent of the International Working-Men's Union:—

“Since Freemasonry is an association universal

in its range, wise and humane in its influences, it must for the aforesaid reasons encourage, protect, and endeavour to extend all those praiseworthy efforts which have for their object the amelioration of the condition of the working-classes. For this end, respected Brethren, I have the honour of requesting you kindly to lend me your assistance, both moral and pecuniary, in furthering the great work to be carried out ere long in Belgium, namely, the emancipation of working-men. It is proposed to hold a Workman's Congress in this town, and our contributions in money will be needed to defray the expenses unavoidable at such a gathering as this. The workmen are poor, and it is our duty to assist them.

"The transactions of this Congress, and the documents which will then be drawn up, will doubtless serve in no small measure to increase that light" (Masonic) "which is to illuminate the path of social progress. The recent international treaties have done much to bring nations together by means of industrial emulation; it remains to effect their closer union through the noble bond of a common Fraternity, and the means to accomplish this is by holding vast assemblies of men from all lands."

This appeal of the Jewish Brother Fribourg was well received by the Lodges; amongst others, by those belonging to the Scotch rite, La Ligne Droite, Les Hospitaliers de St Ouen, Lodge No. 133; and also by those belonging to the French rite, La Rose du parfait silence, L'Avenir, La Renaissance.

In this way we learn whence the funds at the disposal of the International are supplied, at least in part, and particularly who was expected to defray the expenses of the General Congress, expenses which must necessarily be considerable. At all events, it is curious to observe with what absolute liberty social democracy is allowed to avail itself of the privileges of holding meetings, and of forming Unions, although its efforts are known to be directed to the complete subversion of the existing order of things. Were a religious body to claim a hundredth part of such liberty, it would most assuredly be proscribed over and over again within the course of a few days.

II. DEMONSTRATION OF FREEMASONRY IN FAVOUR OF THE PARIS COMMUNE. (An article by SAINT-GENEST, which appeared in the Figaro, and was copied in Gautrelet, La Franc-maçonnerie et la Révolution, Lyon, 1872, p. 618).

It was on April 26th, 1871, that the leading Lodge of Paris held an extraordinary sitting in the Temple N., in order to make known publicly its espousal of the Communist cause. On the following day a deputation was sent to the members of the Communal Government, when the leader,

Brother Thirifoque, spoke thus:—"Every hope of a peaceful accommodation being now at an end, the Freemasons have consequently determined to plant their banner on the city walls, and if the army does not cease firing, the Grand Orient is prepared to declare war against the Versailles Government." "Citizens!" he exclaimed, "the Commune is the grandest sight which has ever been presented to the world. It is the modern Temple of Solomon, all Freemasons are pledged to defend it."

At these words Citizen Jules Vallès took off his red sash and handed it to Brother Thirifoque, who wound it round the flagstaff of the colours they were carrying, and the Deputation withdrew after having fired three volleys (of cheers) according to the Scotch and French rite. Two days after, on April 29th, a day ever memorable in the annals of Freemasonry, a procession of Freemasons paraded through the streets of Paris in the following order:—

The Frère Terrible (Novice Master of the Order).

The Princes of Lebanon (twenty-sixth grade).

Lastly, the Brothers Felix Pyat, Lefrançais Fränckel, Clement Potier.

With theatrical gravity, and an air of assumed importance, they marched to Avenue Friedland, No. 59, where the Grand Orient held another sitting, and dispatched messengers to the Government of Versailles, with the intimation that the firing must immediately be stopped.

Thereupon the procession was again set in motion, with colours flying and drums beating, being followed by an immense rabble, shouting at their heels, "Vive la Commune! Vive le Grand Orient!"

Having arrived at the city walls, the two "Guards"<sup>1</sup> went forward, followed by the members of the Lodges Neuf Sœurs, and the Knights of the Iris; the Almoner of the Lodge, attended by his two acolytes, turns the square towards the East; the Princes of the Tabernacle take up the prescribed positions; before long the azure standards are seen to wave upon the bastions amongst the red flags of the Commune.

Was it possible that the army of Versailles had heard nothing of this would-be imposing demon-

Then the Worshipful Master spoke:—"Since things are thus, let the whole tribe of Mizraim advance, and let the high command be executed without delay!" Amidst universal admiration, the chosen tribe slowly approaches the walls; its leader turns towards the West; Brother Thirifoque grasps his flashing sword with his left hand, and exclaims three times, "I call upon the army of Versailles to lay down its arms immediately! For should a single one of our banners be struck, we swear, by the great Architect of the Universe" — Whilst this unfinished sentence was still hovering on his lips, his square was dashed out of his hand by a mischievous ball; this spread consternation in the ranks of the Freemasons, and the crowd, dumb with terror, hastened back to the Avenue de la Grande Armée.

"Do they still resist?" cries the Worshipful Master. "Then let the Brethren of Kadosch advance."

On seeing the Grade of Kadosch approach the walls, solemn and terrible to behold, the people firmly believed the disastrous war to be at an end, and broke out into enthusiastic shouts; balloons bearing the emblems of Freemasonry were already seen to ascend into the air, in order to announce to the provinces the termination of the struggle, when a perfect shower of bullets drove back the crowd once more.

“Monstrous!” exclaimed the Worshipful Master. “But no matter. If the reactionary party will not give way, the Knights of the Sacred Arch of James VI. shall unfurl their banner in face of the sacrilegious army.”

This news spreads the greatest excitement throughout Paris. A reverential silence generally prevails; every one feels that at last a power is approaching which no human force is able to withstand.

The column of the Knights of St James advances slowly towards the bastions, with the great banner of Useda flying. On the summit of the wall they put the points of their swords together on high, and in this way form the great Arch of Steel, while their bands play a triumphal march, and the Brothers Thirifoque and Fabreguette, together with Felix Pyat and Jules Vallès, begin to form the “Chain of Union.”<sup>1</sup>

The Brethren of the Grade of Kadosch shout “Hurrah, hurrah!” “Mirra,” respond the Knights. Meanwhile murmurs of “Vive la Commune,” “Vive le Grand Orient,” are heard from the populace.

At the very moment when the Worshipful Master is waving his staff three times as a sign that peace is concluded, behold a shell comes flying down, bursts in the midst of the Steel Arch,

and scatters the "Chain of Union" in the wildest disorder.<sup>1</sup>

The frère terrible, seized with panic terror, drops his flashing sword, retreats towards the East, drawing with him in his headlong flight the Knights of the Brazen Serpent as well as the Princes of Lebanon, the Brethren of the Shining Circle and of the Kadosch. The consternation is so great, that the Knights of the Sacred Arch of James VI. spring hastily from the rampart, and solemnly declare that the time has come to hold a new sitting. After an hour's deliberation, the announcement is made that a most weighty determination has been arrived at.

In consideration, namely, of the highly perilous position in which France is at present, the Worshipful Master has resolved that the Supreme Grand Councillor of the Sovereign, and absolute Grand Master of the thirty-third grade (according to other reckoning the ninetieth grade), should, in his own most exalted person, ascend the wall; and if this time a ball should come near the banner, the Grand-Orient would forthwith condemn M. Thiers to death, as it had done King William six months previously.

Now the people of Paris were to see a sight such as they had never witnessed before. "O spectacle ever to be remembered!" exclaimed a Masonic periodical of that day in grandiloquent bombast.

“O spectacle deserving of eternal admiration!” The whole column of the highest grade advanced in solemn silence through the astonished crowd, headed by its illustrious and chosen Knight. Having arrived at the foot of the wall, the Worshipful Master himself kindled the three stars (lights) on the great gold candlestick, grasped the candlestick of the East and turned it towards the West. The column of harmony (band) struck up the Noachite’s march, while envoys were dispatched at full gallop to announce to the troops of the vanguard that the banners seen upon the walls were those of the Supreme Councillor of the Sovereign Grand Master.

But in the most solemn moment of all, just as the exalted and chosen Knight took up the golden hammer and attached it to his blue ribbon, behold a procession of Religious, who had just been expelled from their convent hard by, was seen wending its way. This caused a slight confusion in the ranks of the illustrious children of light. The sight of these followers of the Christian superstition produced a feeling of the greatest contempt in the minds of all present. Many of the Religious even held in their hands a Crucifix, the very symbol of their superstition and idolatry; and to every one who had but a moment before witnessed the pompous and imposing ceremonies of social democracy, this could not but appear a challenge on the part of those black robes who dared thus to promenade past the Brethren of

However, it was feared that serious consequences might ensue from the justifiable indignation felt by all lookers-on. In order to calm the excited crowds, they were informed that a suitable number of hostages had been selected from the members of this hateful class of men, and that they should certainly be put to death the moment the troops of Versailles dared to set foot in Paris. "All right, let them go then!" cried the sovereign people. "Away with you, birds of night, your day is over for ever! People nowadays know too much and see too much for you! We want no more of your mysterious doings and absurd ceremonies!"

While the priests who had been thus loaded with abuse were forced to pursue their way amid the curses of the mob, the Column of the Grand Councillor of the thirty-third grade set forth once more on its triumphal march, preceded by the drummers. Seven crossed swords formed the Steel Arch. Brother Thirifoque turned his compasses three times towards the East, crying, "Absa, Absa, Absa!" the column of harmony meanwhile playing "The Great Architect of Nature." At last the news got wind that the army of Versailles had declared itself conquered, and that a Brother of the Craft, an officer in the Versailles vanguard, demanded an immediate parley with the members of the Grand Orient.

not made public, but one thing is certain, that the populace were profoundly moved, and the soldiers greatly astonished to see their officer all at once take up the solemn (Masonic) position while the envoy approached, extending one arm towards the East, and holding in the other the brazen staff. On finding that the members of the Supreme Council of the Ne plus ultra degree had set up their standards, a truce was forthwith agreed upon, and "a deputation sent to the President of the Republic."

What went on between the "Brethren" and the sceptical President Thiers? Who can tell? Thus much, however, we know for certain, that all negotiations were fruitless. In vain did the frère terrible thrice successively strike his white wand upon the ground; in vain did the Knights Kadosch, looking to the East, form the great Steel Arch above Thiers' head; in vain did the Knights of the Brazen Serpent offer him the golden mallet amid threefold huzzas. After twenty-four hours the fighting recommenced with more fury than ever.

Some may now wonder that common cause was made between the Grand Orient and such men as Jules Vallès and Felix Pyat. Others may feel indignant that, immediately after the murder of two French generals, and on the eve of the burning of the capital, ten thousand Freemasons should declare in Paris that the Commune was the modern Temple of Solomon. To the initiated it has long been no secret that the relationship existing between Freemasonry and social democracy, is as close as that between a mother and her child. But when posterity shall be informed that in the middle of the nineteenth century, in the midst of an unbelieving generation, which openly denied God and His Christ, under the very guns of an enemy in possession of all the French fortresses, hostilities were all at once suspended, and the course of a portentous and calamitous civil war interrupted, because, forsooth, Brother Thirifoque, accompanied by two Knights Kadosch, went to offer to M. Thiers' acceptance the golden mallet of supreme command (in the Craft); when, I say, this story is told to those who come after us, it will sound in their ears as a nursery tale, utterly unworthy of credence.—Figaro.

MASONIC FESTIVALS.

I. A MASONIC BANQUET AT PROVINS (Dep. Seine-et-Marne) 1845.—(From the Franc-maçon, 1st Series, p. 121.)

THE banqueting-hall had been recently painted; thus all was in perfect order, fresh, and attractive, presenting a pleasing and festive appearance. The waiters were active, noiseless, attentive, and well-drilled; they moved silently and busily around the long plank (table), which had been arranged in the form of a horse-shoe. The net (table-cloth) and the banners (dinner-napkins) were of dazzling whiteness, the unhewn stone (bread) was of the purest wheat, the white sand (salt) and the yellow mortar (pepper) were ground as fine as possible. The shovels (ladles), pickaxes (forks), and trowels (spoons), shone with the brilliancy of the purest silver. The transparent cannons (glasses), which had been cast expressly in a triangular form, and the barrels (bottles) stood in line (were placed) upon a blue ribbon laid in a curve along the whole length of the net (table-cloth), on both sides of the workshop (dining-table). A hundred small candelabra were on the table, each with a star (taper), one being placed opposite to every cover. The swords (knives), tridents (large forks), tiles (plates), and squares (dishes), made a clatter by no means unpleasant. Every guest pushed his bench (chair) and cannon (glass) somewhat nearer to that of his neighbour, in order to enjoy a friendly chat. The red and white powder (wine) gleamed in the hands of the joyous Brethren; the less powerful powder (water) in those of the officials of the Lodge, whose duty it was to keep a watchful eye on all, to direct the works, to hew the blocks of stone (cut the bread), to hand the other materials (dishes), to see that nothing is wanting at the table, to superintend the distribution of the strong powder (wine), the detonating powder (liqueur), and the white stone (sugar), and finally, to order the customary cannonades or batteries (toasts). Nothing could give a better idea of the arrangements of Freemasonry than this splendid banquet at Provins. The Worshipful Master<sup>1</sup> sat in the midst of the workshop, the two Wardens at the two ends, the Orator at the head of the South Column (the row of guests on the southern side). . . . .

TWO festivals are annually kept in the Order, one on Midsummer-day (St John Baptist), and the other on December 27 (St John Evangelist). Both of these festive gatherings are closed by a banquet; at which all Freemasons, without exception, are expected to be present.

<sup>1</sup> This Worshipful Master was, the same journal informs us (July 1851), the son of Mocquard, formerly private secretary to Napoleon III. Epicurean banquets such as this are intended to serve as baits to the profane (those not yet initiated), and to satisfy such as see in Freemasonry an institution designed to promote conviviality and the enjoyment of life, but are never meant to see its real secrets. To the "liberal" Mason they are, however, wearisome, on account of their elaborate ceremonial.

The banqueting-hall must be so roofed in (only accessible to Freemasons) that the rain may not penetrate (none but Masons be present). It is generally decorated with festoons of flowers, on the walls hang the banner of the Lodge, and those of such workshops (Lodges) as have sent deputations to it. The table is arranged in the form of a horse-shoe; the Worshipful (Master of the Lodge) occupies the place of honour in the middle, the Wardens sit at the two ends. All the things on the table are arranged in four parallel lines; in the first, counting from outside, are the plates, in the second the glasses, in the third the bottles, in the fourth the dishes.

The Masonic table has its own phraseology: to chew or spread mortar—to eat; to fire a cannonade—to drink; a battery—toast. Every one is forced to make use of these technical expressions, each lapsus linguæ being punished with a discharge of weak powder (a glass of water). The same punishment is inflicted for every fault committed at table; it is the place of the Master of Ceremonies to hand the instrument of punishment to the culprit.

During the feast it is the rule to propose seven toasts. While the healths are being fired (drunk), the masonry (eating) ceases. By command of the Worshipful Master the cannon are loaded (the glasses are filled); obedient to orders, the Brethren rise, and throw their banners (napkins) over the left shoulder. Then the Worshipful Master begins thus—"My Brethren, let us drink the health of our dearly-loved N——. Let us fire a volley, a good volley, a sharp, quick volley. Now, Brethren, your right hand on your sword (knife)! Swords on high! Salute with the sword! Pass the sword to the left hand! The right on the weapon (glass)! Present arms! Take aim (hold before the lips)! Fire (every man drinks)! A good volley (they drink again)! A sharp volley (the glasses are emptied)! Shoulder arms (the glass is held to the right shoulder)! Arms in front! Present arms! One (the glass is brought to the left shoulder)! Two (to the right shoulder)! Three (before the breast)! Arms at rest! One! Two! Three! (At each word of command a movement is made with the glass in the direction of the table, until, at "three," the glasses are deposited on the table with such military precision, that only one sound is audible.<sup>1</sup> The sword in the left hand! Swords on high! Salute! Swords at rest (here the knives are laid down)! Follow me, Brethren (in imitation of the Worshipful Master, the Masons make the sign, fire the battery, and give the plaudits)!"

In giving toasts, it is generally the custom to speak a few words expressive of esteem and good wishes for the Brother whose health is drunk. Thanks are returned after all toasts, the Master of the Ceremonies answering for absent or newly-received Members. When the health of the reigning monarch is drunk, the Master of Ceremonies takes his place between the two Wardens, asks permission to speak, and returns thanks in the name of his Sovereign.<sup>1</sup> His speech being ended, he discharges a battery in the manner described above, and at the conclusion dashes his glass on the ground, as a sign that it is never to be made use of on any less solemn occasion.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>1</sup> At the extraordinary meeting of Masons convened at Mons, in Belgium, in 1839, the Master of the Ceremonies, in responding to the health of the King, spoke as follows:—"Your good wishes and acclamations have reached the throne, and touched the heart of your Mason-King. By his own free will and desire he became a member of the Craft, and Masons ever find in him a sympathising friend. He knows that your principles are those of law and order, and that the children of light have ever proved the firmest supporters of constitutional monarchy. Be assured, therefore, that the Prince's Lowtons (or Louvetons, whelps = the sons of Freemasons) will be trained from their childhood in these principles, and will devote their life to promote the happiness and prosperity of their country." In sober truth, do expressions such as these show due respect to the dignity of the crown? Do they proceed from hearts devoted to the cause of monarchy? See "Tracé de la tenue extraordinaire du 12 j. du 3 mois, 5839," Mons, p. 57.

III. BANQUET IN A LODGE OF WOMEN. (Clavel, "Histoire Pittoresque," Introduction, p. 33.)

THE banqueting-hall is divided into four climes (the walls). The East is called Asia; the West, Europe; the South, Africa; and the North, America. The table is in the form of a horse-shoe; all other arrangements are similar to those in the Lodges of men. The Lady-President or Grand Mistress is supported by a Grand Master, and sits in the clime of Asia. The Sister Inspectress, supported by the Brother Inspector, and the Sister Treasurers, supported by the Brother  $\therefore$  Treasurer, occupy severally the two ends of the table; the former sitting in the clime of America, the latter in that of Africa. The ladies are not without a phraseology peculiar to themselves. The Temple (Lodge) is called Eden; the doors, barriers; the register, ladder; the glasses, lamps; the wine, red oil; the water, white oil; the bottles and decanters are termed pitchers. To put oil in the lamps is to fill the glasses; to extinguish the lamp is to drink the wine; to hold on high in the five fingers is to carry the glass to the lips; to "fire!" is to drink.

The sign is to place the hands on the breast so that the right lies on the left, and the two thumbs joining, form a triangle. The word is "Eve," repeated five times.

Healts are drunk much in the same way as in the Lodges of men. The Grand Mistress is presented with the hammer, with which she strikes before giving the words of command.<sup>1</sup> These are immediately communicated to the groups at the different tables by the male and female officials of the Lodge. When the lamps are prepared and placed in a line, and all is made ready, the Grand Mistress speaks in the following terms:— "My Brethren and Sisters! The health I am about to propose to you is that of N——. To honour so welcome a toast, let us extinguish our lamps in five blasts! The lamp in the right hand! Extinguish the lamps! The lamp in front! Set the lamp down! One, two, three, four, five!" From "one" to "four" the Grand Mistress and all the assembled guests hold the "lamps" before their breast, at "five" they simultaneously set them down upon the table with considerable noise.

We prefer not to enter upon the consequences which in olden times resulted from the repeated "extinction of lamps" by uncontrolled women in the company of masculine libertines. Catholics will readily understand why many "Children of the Widow" (members of the Craft) can refuse to

IV. OBSEQUIES CELEBRATED BY THE GRAND ORIENT OF BRUSSELS ON THE DEATH OF BROTHER LEOPOLD OF SAXE-COBURG, KING OF THE BELGIANS, 1866.

THE hall is draped with black. In the background the tapestries are adorned with festoons of white, with tears and silver fringes. On the side-walls are hung shields inscribed with funeral mottoes in letters of silver. In the midst stands the catafalque raised on three steps, and guarded on the right and left by four high dignitaries with their swords drawn, and the black riband of the Maitre élu des Neuf around their necks. A funeral lamp is suspended from the ceiling.

The whole nave of the Temple is dimly lighted; the altar, draped with black, stands in the left corner at the side of the tomb; in the right corner is a statue of the deceased veiled with black crape. Before the tomb stands an antique tripod, on which a lamp is burning; to the right and left are brasiers, from which clouds of incense and perfumes arise; on a table are placed a basket filled with leaves of flowers, a vessel containing wine, another containing milk, and a third containing purifying water (in imitation of holy water).

“Listen to my words, honoured shade of our distinguished Brother! In the name of all Masons here present, I offer thee water, by means of which Nature is perpetually renewed, and which, in the course of its various transformations, casts off all defilement, thus becoming a fit emblem of purity. I offer thee wine, which the labours of man win from the vine. It is the emblem of strength. I offer thee milk, the first food of mankind. It is the emblem of simplicity.

“Death, like a devouring flame, consuming all things, has caused thee to disappear from our midst; but to destroy thy memory is not within his power. This memory, like these sweet perfumes diffusing themselves in the air, will serve to animate our courage, kindle our zeal, and guide us in the performance of the duties incumbent upon us.”

After this a speech from the Grand Orator followed, on the conclusion of which the Grand Master approached the altar, threw incense on it three times, with these words—“As the smoke of this incense rises to heaven, so may the soul of our Brother ascend to its celestial source.”<sup>1</sup>

Returning to the throne, the Grand Master begins afresh—"My Brethren of the Orient, unite with me in scattering flowers upon the tomb of our honoured Brother, as a token of our friendship and an emblem of our grief." The Grand Master and the Brethren, sitting on the East side, then advance to the catafalque, and thrice cast upon it a handful of flower-leaves. The Brother Wardens at the head of their columns do the same in their turn.

After this offering to the dead, the Most Serene Grand Master invites all present to stand up in order of rank, while he pronounces the last farewell to the departed. He then calls upon the two Wardens to assist him in closing the tomb. Arrived at the foot of the catafalque, he strikes with the hammer three times on the edge of the tomb, saying, "Farewell! farewell! farewell!"

Then returning to his throne, he thus speaks:—"My Brethren, stand up all of you in your ranks. Our venerated Brother Leopold of Saxe-Coburg is no more! We shall never again behold that distinguished Freemason; but the soul of our beloved Brother has returned to its celestial source. So let us hope; let us hope!"

For the closing scene the decorations are changed, the Lodge being transformed into a temple of immortality, radiant with light. In the centre is a bust of Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, brilliantly illuminated; around it are allegorical figures holding out to him crowns and palms of immortality. In the background are some scenes, painted by Brother Welbrandt, representing Elysium. Music is heard ; as the last chords die away, the Grand Master exclaims, "Brethren, our hopes are fulfilled ! Our Brother has taken his place amongst the benefactors of humanity ; he will eternally shine in the temple of immortality !"

OATH TAKEN BY THE PAPAL ZOUAVES, PLEDGING THEMSELVES NEVER TO JOIN THE SECRET SOCIETIES.—(Taken in the presence of General Lamoricière, in the Church of St John Lateran).

"I SWEAR to Almighty God, to our Chief Pastor and Holy Father Pope Pius IX., and to his lawful successors, fidelity and obedience. I swear to serve him honourably and faithfully, and even to sacrifice my life in the defence of his illustrious and sacred person, for the maintenance of his sovereignty and his rights. I swear never to belong to any civil or religious sect ; to any secret league or association which directly or indirectly attacks the Roman Catholic religion, and aims at the overthrow of social order. I swear never to join any sect or society which has been condemned by decrees of the Popes of Rome. So help me God and His Holy Gospel, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

EXTRACT FROM A SPEECH OF THE HOLY FATHER
Delle Stimmate, 1867).

NOTHING in the Papal Allocution of September 25, 1866, aroused the angry hostility of members of the Craft so strongly as did the following passage, in which the Holy Father warns the faithful against the snares of secret societies. But, unmoved by the war of words, the Supreme Pastor of Christendom reverted to the same subject in an address delivered the year after in the Church Delle Stimmate, in Rome. In this speech the following most interesting passage occurs, which we copy from the Osservatore Romano:—"O my sons!" said the Pope, addressing the young men assembled before him, "consider the dangers which surround you, and cling closely to the precious treasure of the faith. Evil-minded men will hold out to you worldly advantages. These you must reject. They will offer you counsel. Flee from it. They will seek to draw you after them. Escape out of their hands. How many there are, who, when in the first bloom of youth, as you are now, held the faith and practised it, but of whom, later on, we learn with sorrow that they have been seduced by evil men, and have fallen into error and vice! I myself was personally acquainted with one who in these days has attained a melancholy celebrity; one who, as a young man twenty years ago, used to talk with me about the state of Christian perfection and holiness, and seriously thought of entering a Religious Order. Later on I heard, to my grief, that he had been led astray by bad companions, and had been dragged from one abyss to another, until at length he gained for himself a European, indeed a world-wide notoriety, and finally laid his head on the block in expiation of his crimes. I bid you therefore beware, and keep this warning ever before your eyes. Pray God to grant you perseverance in all that is good!"

The victim of bad companions and secret societies to whom the Pope here alludes was the Freemason Felix Orsini, the originator of the infamous attack on the life of Napoleon III.

FREEMASONRY AND THE OCCUPATION OF ROME,
SEPT. 20, 1870.

TO all acquainted with the real state of affairs, it has long been no secret that Freemasonry was closely concerned in the late occupation of Rome (Sept. 20th). Let us hear more particulars on the subject. The Journal de Florence (Univers, Jan. 31, 1873), says—"After the battle of Sedan, our (Italian) Ministers were for some time undecided with regard to the occupation of Rome. Most probably this event would never have taken place but for a deputation of Freemasons, who obtained an audience of the Minister Lanza. They handed him a small slip of paper, on which was written this truly laconic message—If the Government does not immediately give orders to march on Rome, the revolution will break out in every town of Italy. Lanza read the paper and examined the signatures; he saw that they were exclusively those of heads of Lodges, and at once he gave General Cadorna orders to march. The petition was made public, as well as the signatures attached to it, and any one desirous of knowing who the persons were need only consult the Annuario della Frammassoneria Italiana. From the foregoing, it appears evident to us, and we think all editors of newspapers must share our opinion, that the members of the Craft occupy themselves with something very different to harmless banquets and grotesque ceremonies.”

Sin and its Consequences. By His Eminence
the CARDINAL ARCHBISHOP OF WESTMINSTER. Second edition. 6s.

CONTENTS: I. The Nature of Sin. II. Mortal Sin.
III. Venial Sin. IV. Sins of Omission. V. The Grace and Works of Penance. VI. Temptation. VII. The Dercliation on the Cross. VIII. The Joys of the Resurrection.

'We know few better books than this for spiritual reading. These lectures are prepared with great care, and are worthy to rank with the old volumes of sermons which are now standard works of the English tongue.'—Weekly Register.

'We have had many volumes from his Grace's pen of this kind, but perhaps none more practical or more searching than the volume before us. These discourses are the clearest and simplest exposition of the theology of the subjects they treat of that could be desired. The intellect is addressed as well as the conscience. Both are strengthened and satisfied.'—Tablet.

'Of the deepest value, and of great theological and literary excellence. More clear and lucid expositions of dogmatic and moral theology could not be found. No one can read these very forcible, searching, and practical sermons without being deeply stirred and greatly edified.'—Church Herald.

'His Grace has added to Catholic literature such a brilliant disquisition as can hardly be equalled.'—Catholic Times.

'As powerful, searching, and deep as any that we have ever read. In construction, as well as in theology and in rhetoric, they are more than remarkable, and are amongst the best from his Grace's pen.'—Union Review.

The Prophet of Carmel: a Series of Practical Considerations upon the History of Elias in the Old Testament; with a Supplementary Dissertation. By the Rev. CHARLES B. GARSIDE, M.A. Dedicated to the Very Rev. JOHN HENRY NEWMAN, D.D. 5s.

'There is not a page in these sermons but commands our respect. They are Corban in the best sense; they belong to the sanctuary, and are marked as divine property by a special cachet. They are simple without being trite, and poetical without being pretentious.'—Westminster Gazette.

'Full of spiritual wisdom uttered in pure and engaging language.'—The Universe.

'We see in these pages the learning of the divine, the elegance of the scholar, and the piety of the priest. Every point in the sacred narrative bearing upon the subject of his book is seized upon by the author with the greatest keenness of perception, and set forth with singular force and clearness.'—Weekly Register.

'Under his master-hand the marvellous career of the Prophet of Carmel displays its majestic proportions. His strong, nervous, incisive style has a beauty and a grace, a delicacy and a sensitiveness, that seizes hold of the heart and captivates the imagination. He has attained to the highest art of writing, which consists in selecting the words which express one's meaning with the greatest clearness in the least possible space.'—Tablet.

'The intellectual penetration, the rich imagination, the nervous eloquence which we meet with throughout the whole work, all combine to give it at once a very high place among the highest productions of our English Catholic literature.'—Dublin Review.

'Is at once powerful and engaging, and calculated to furnish ideas innumerable to the Christian preacher.'—Church Review.

'The thoughts are expressed in plain and vigorous English. The sermons are good specimens of the way in which Old Testament subjects should be treated for the instruction of a Christian congregation.'—Church Times.

Mary magnifying God: May Sermons. By the Rev. Fr. HUMPHREY, O.S.C. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

'Each sermon is a complete thesis, eminent for the strength of its logic, the soundness of its theology, and the lucidness of its expression. With equal force and beauty of language the author has provided matter for the most sublime meditations.'—Tablet.

'Dogmatic teaching of the utmost importance is placed before us so clearly, simply, and unaffectedly, that we find ourselves acquiring invaluable lessons of theology in every page.'—Weekly Register.

By the same,

The Divine Teacher. Second edition. 2s. 6d.

'The most excellent treatise we have ever read. It could not be clearer, and, while really deep, it is perfectly intelligible to any person of the most ordinary education.'—Tablet.

Vol. IV., completing the work. 4s.

'This admirable little book will be much valued by all, but especially by the clergy, for whose use it is more immediately intended. The Archbishop states in his Preface that it is held in high esteem in Rome, and that he has himself found, by the experience of many years, its singular excellence, its practical piety, its abundance of Scripture, of the Fathers, and of ecclesiastical writers.'—Tablet.

'It is a sufficient recommendation to this book of meditations that our Archbishop has given them his own warm approval. . . . They are full of the language of the Scriptures, and are rich with unction of their Divine sense.'—Weekly Register.

'A manual of meditations for priests, to which we have seen nothing comparable.'—Catholic World.

'There is great beauty in the thoughts, the illustrations are striking, the learning shown in patristic quotation considerable, and the special applications to priests are very powerful. It is entirely a priest's book.'—Church Review.

The Question of Anglican Ordinations discussed. By the Very Rev. Canon ESTCOURT, M.A., F.A.S.
With an Appendix of Original Documents and Photographic Facsimiles. One vol. 8vo, 14s.

'A valuable contribution to the theology of the Sacrament of Order. He treats a leading question, from a practical point of view, with great erudition, and with abundance of illustrations from the rites of various ages and countries.'—Month.

'Will henceforth be an indispensable portion of every priest's library, inasmuch as it contains all the information that has been collected in previous works, sifted and corrected, together with a well-digested mass of important matter which has never before been given to the public.'—Tablet.

'Marks a very important epoch in the history of that question, and virtually disposes of it.'—Messenger.

'Canon Estcourt has added valuable documents that have never appeared before, or never at full length. The result is a work of very great value.'—Catholic Opinion.

'Indicates conscientious and painstaking research, and will be indispensable to any student who would examine the question on which it treats.'—Bookseller.

'Superior, both in literary method, tone, and mode of reasoning, to the usual controversial books on this subject.'—Church Herald.

May Papers; or Thoughts on the Litanies of Loreto. By EDWARD IGNATIUS PURBRICK, Priest of the Society of Jesus. 3s. 6d.

'There is a brightness and vivacity in them which will make them interesting to all, old and young alike, and adds to their intrinsic value.'—Dublin Review.

'We very gladly welcome this volume as a valuable addition to the now happily numerous manuals of devout exercises for the month.'—Month.

'Written in the pure, simple, unaffected language which becomes the subject.'—Tablet.

'We cannot easily conceive a book more calculated to aid the cause of true religion amongst young persons of every class.'—Weekly Register.

'They are admirable, and expressed in chaste and beautiful language. Although compiled in the first place for boys at school, they are adapted for the spiritual reading of Catholics of every age and condition of life.'—Catholic Opinion.

WORKS OF THE REV. FATHER RAWES, O.S.C.

'A series of beautiful word pictures.'—Catholic Opinion.

'Full of holy thoughts and exquisite poetry, and just such a book as can be taken up with advantage and relief in hours of sadness and depression.'—Dublin Review.

'Is really beautiful, and will be read with profit.'—Church Times.

SUBJECTS: I. God in Creation. II. God in the Incarnation. III. God in the Holy See. IV. God in the Heart. V. God in the Resurrection.

'Full of striking imagery, and the beauty of the language cannot fail to make the book valuable for spiritual reading.'—Catholic Times.

'He has so applied science as to bring before the reader an unbroken course of thought and argument.'—Tablet.

The Beloved Disciple; or St. John the Evangelist. 3s. 6d.

'Full of research, and of tender and loving devotion.'—Tablet.

'This is altogether a charming book for spiritual reading.'—Catholic Times.

'St. John, in his varied character, is beautifully and attractively presented to our pious contemplation.'—Catholic Opinion.

Septem: Seven Ways of hearing Mass. Fifth edition. 1s. and 2s.; red edges, 2s. 6d.; calf, 4s.; French Translation, 1s. 6d.

'A great assistance to hearing Mass with devotion. Besides its devotional advantages it possesses a Preface, in clear and beautiful language, well worth reading.'—Tablet.

Great Truths in Little Words. Third edition. Neat cloth, 3s. 6d.

'A most valuable little work. All may learn very much about the Faith from it.'—Tablet.

'At once practical in its tendency, and elegant; oftentimes poetical in its diction.'—Weekly Register.

'Cannot fail to be most valuable to every Catholic; and we feel certain, when known and appreciated, it will be a standard work in Catholic households.'—Catholic Times.

'Sound Catholic theology and a truly religious spirit breathes from every page, and it may be safely commended to schools and convents.'—Tablet.

'Full of sound instruction given in a pointed and amusing manner.'—Weekly Register.

'Very pretty, pleasantly told, attractive to little folks, and of such a nature that from each some moral good is inculcated. The tales are cheerful, sound, and sweet, and should have a large sale.'—Catholic Times.

Marie and Paul: a Fragment. By 'Our Little Woman.' 3s. 6d.; gilt edges, 4s.

'We heartily recommend this touching little tale, especially as a present for children and for schools, feeling sure that none can rise from its perusal without being touched, both at the beauty of the tale itself and by the tone of earnest piety which runs through the whole, leaving none but holy thoughts and pleasant impressions on the minds of both old and young.'—Tablet.

'Well adapted to the innocent minds it is intended for. The little book would be a suitable present for a little friend.'—Catholic Opinion.

'A charming tale for young and old.'—Cork Examiner.

'To all who read it the book will suggest thoughts for which they will be the better, while its graceful and affecting, because simple, pictures of home and family life will excite emotions of which none need be ashamed.'—Month.

'Told effectively and touchingly, with all that tenderness and pathos in which gifted women so much excel.'—Weekly Register.

'A very pretty and pathetic tale.'—Catholic World.

'A very charming story, and may be read by both young and old.'—Brownson's Review.

CONTENTS: I. The Wise Nun of Eastonmere. II. Known Too Late. III. True to the End. IV. Olive's Rescue.

'We have read the volume with considerable pleasure, and we trust no small profit. The tales are decidedly clever, well worked out, and written with a flowing and cheerful pen.'—Catholic Times.

'The author of Tyborne is too well known to need any fresh recommendation to the readers of Catholic fiction. We need only say that her present will be as welcome to her many friends as any of her former works.'—Month.

'An attractive volume; and we know of few tales that we can more safely or more thoroughly recommend to our young readers.'—Weekly Register.

'We strongly recommend these stories. They are especially suited to little girls.'—Tablet.

'The very thing for a gift-book for a child; but at the same time so interesting and full of incident that it will not be contemned by children of a larger growth.'—Weekly Register.

'We have seldom seen tales better adapted for children's reading.'—Catholic Times.

ST. JOSEPH'S THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY.

Vol. I.

On some Popular Errors concerning Politics and Religion. By the Right Honourable Lord ROBERT MONTAGU, M.P. 6s.

CONTENTS: Introduction. I. The Basis of Political Science. II. Religion. III. The Church. IV. Religious Orders. V. Christian Law. VI. The Mass. VII. The Principles of 1789. VIII. Liberty. IX. Fraternity. X. Equality. XI. Nationality, Non-intervention, and the Accomplished Fact. XII. Capital Punishment. XIII. Liberal Catholics.

xiv. Civil Marriage. xv. Secularisation of Education.
xvi. Conclusion. Additional Notes.

This book has been taken from the 'Risposte popolari alle obiezioni piu diffuse contro la Religione; opera del P. Secondo Franco. Torino, 1868.' It is not a translation of that excellent Italian work, for much has been omitted, and even the forms of expression have not been retained; nor yet is it an abstract, for other matter has been added throughout. The aim of the editor has been merely to follow out the intention of P. Franco, and adapt his thoughts to the circumstances and mind of England.

Considerations for a Three Days' Preparation for Communion. Taken chiefly from the French of SAINT JURE, S.J. By CECILIE MARY CADDELL. 8d.

'A simple and easy method for a devout preparation for that solemn duty.'—Weekly Register.

'A beautiful compilation carefully prepared.'—Universe.

The Spiritual Conflict and Conquest. By Dom J. CASTANIZA, O.S.B. Edited, with Preface and Notes, by Canon VAUGHAN, English Monk of the Order of St. Benedict. Second edition. Reprinted from the old English Translation of 1652. With fine Original Frontispiece reproduced in Autotype. 8s. 6d.

The Letter-Books of Sir Amias Poulet, Keeper of Mary Queen of Scots. Edited by JOHN MORRIS, Priest of the Society of Jesus. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

Sir Amias Poulet had charge of the Queen of Scots from April 1585 to the time of her death, February 8, 1587. His correspondence with Lord-Treasurer Burghley and Sir Francis Walsingham enters into the details of her life in captivity at Tutbury, Chartley, and Fotheringay. Many of the letters now published are entirely unknown, being printed from a recently-discovered manuscript. The others have been taken from the originals at the Public Record Office and the British Museum. The letters are strung together by a running commentary, in the course of which several of Mr. Froude's statements are examined, and the question of Mary's complicity in the plot against Elizabeth's life is discussed.

Sister of Charity. By the Author of 'A Sketch of the Life of St. Paula.' Second edition, enlarged. On toned paper, cloth gilt, 4s. 6d.; plain paper, cloth plain, 3s.

'It is impossible to read it without bearing away in one's heart some of the "odour of sweetness" which breathes forth from almost every page.'— Tablet.

'The most charming piece of religious biography that has appeared since the Récits d'une Sœur.'—Catholic Opinion.

'We have seldom read a more touching tale of youthful holiness.'—Weekly Register.

'The picture of a life of hidden piety and grace, and of active charity, which it presents is extremely beautiful.'—Nation.

perusal of all our readers.'—Westminster Gazette.

Count de Montalembert's Letters to a School-fellow, 1827-1830. Qualis ab incepto. Translated from the French by C. F. AUDLEY. With Portrait. 5s.

'Simple, easy, and unaffected in a degree, these letters form a really charming volume. The observations are simply wonderful, considering that when he wrote them he was only seventeen or eighteen years of age.'—
Weekly Register.

'A new treasure is now presented for the first time in an English casket—the letters he wrote when a schoolboy. The loftiness of the aspirations they breathe is supported by the intellectual power of which they give evidence.'— Cork Examiner.

'Reveal in the future ecclesiastical champion and historian a depth of feeling and insight into forthcoming events hardly to be expected from a mere schoolboy.'—Building News.

'Display vigour of thought and real intellectual power.'—Church Herald.

Ecclesiastical Antiquities of London and its Suburbs. By ALEXANDER WOOD, M.A. Oxon., of the Somerset Archæological Society. 5s.

'O, who the ruine sees, whom wonder doth not fill
With our great fathers' pompe, devotion, and their skill?'

'Will prove a most useful manual to many of our readers. Stores of Catholic memories still hang about the streets of this great metropolis. For the ancient and religious associations of such places the Catholic reader can want no better cicerone than Mr. Wood.'—Weekly Register.

'We have indeed to thank Mr. Wood for this excellent little book.'—
Catholic Opinion.

'Very seldom have we read a book devoted entirely to the metropolis with such pleasure.'—Liverpool Catholic Times.

'Gives a plain, sensible, but learned and interesting account of the chief church antiquities of London and its suburbs. It is written by a very able and competent author—one who thoroughly appreciates his subject, and who treats it with the discrimination of a critic and the sound common sense of a practised writer.'—Church Herald.

LIBRARY OF RELIGIOUS BIOGRAPHY.

Edited by EDWARD HEALY THOMPSON.

Vol. I.

The Life of St. Aloysius Gonzaga, S. J.

Second edition. 5s.

'Contains numberless traces of a thoughtful and tender devotion to the Saint. It shows a loving penetration into his spirit, and an appreciation of the secret motives of his action, which can only be the result of a deeply affectionate study of his life and character.'—Month.

Vol. II.

The Life of Marie Eustelle Harpain; or the Angel of the Eucharist. Second edition. 5s.

'Possesses a special value and interest apart from its extraordinary natural and supernatural beauty, from the fact that to her example and to the effect of her writings is attributed in great measure the wonderful revival of devotion to the Blessed Sacrament in France, and consequently throughout Western Christendom.'—Dublin Review.

'A more complete instance of that life of purity and close union with God in the world of which we have just been speaking is to be found in the history of Marie Eustelle Harpain, the sempstress of Saint-Palais. The writer of the present volume has had the advantage of very copious materials in the French works on which his own work is founded; and Mr. Thompson has discharged his office as editor with his usual diligence and accuracy.'—Month.

Vol. III.

The Life of St. Stanislas Kostka. 5s.

'We strongly recommend this biography to our readers.'—Tablet.

'There has been no adequate biography of St. Stanislas. In rectifying this want Mr. Thompson has earned a title to the gratitude of English-speaking Catholics. The engaging Saint of Poland will now be better known among us, and we need not fear that, better known, he will not be better loved.'—Weekly Register.

Vol. IV.

The Life of the Baron de Renty; or Perfection in the World exemplified. 6s.

'An excellent book. The style is throughout perfectly fresh and buoyant.'—Dublin Review.

'This beautiful work is a compilation, not of biographical incidents, but of holy thoughts and spiritual aspirations, which we may feed on and make our own.'—Tablet.

'Gives full particulars of his marvellous virtue in an agreeable form.'—Catholic Times.

'A good book for our Catholic young men, teaching how they can sanctify the secular state.'—Catholic Opinion.

'Edifying and instructive, a beacon and guide to those whose walks are in the ways of the world, who toil and strive to win Christian perfection.'—Ulster Examiner.

Vol. V.

The Life of the Venerable Anna Maria Taigi, the Roman Matron (1769-1837). Third edition. With Portrait. 6s.

This Biography has been written after a careful collation of previous Lives of the Servant of God with each other, and with the Analecta Juris Pontificii, which contain large extracts from the Processes. Various prophecies attributed to her and other holy persons have been collected in an Appendix.

'Of all the series of deeply-interesting biographies which the untiring zeal and piety of Mr. Healy Thompson has given of late years to English Catholics, none, we think, is to be compared in interest with the one before us, both from the absorbing nature of the life itself and the spiritual lessons it conveys.'—Tablet.

'A complete biography of the Venerable Matron in the composition of which the greatest care has been taken and the best authorities consulted. We can safely recommend the volume for the discrimination with which it has been written, and for the careful labour and completeness by which it has been distinguished.'—Catholic Opinion.

'We recommend this excellent and carefully-compiled biography to all our readers. The evident care exercised by the editor in collating the various lives of Anna Maria gives great value to the volume, and we hope it will meet with the support it so justly merits.'—Westminster Gazette.

'We thank Mr. Healy Thompson for this volume. The direct purpose of his biographies is always spiritual edification.'—Dublin Review.

'Contains much that is capable of nourishing pious sentiments.'—Nation.

'Has evidently been a labour of love.'—Mouth.

DON, by EDWARD HEALY THOMPSON, M.A. Cloth, 3s.

'This profound and valuable work has been very carefully and ably translated by Mr. Thompson.'—Register.

'The more we have of such works as the Hidden Life of Jesus the better.'—Westminster Gazette.

'A book of searching power.'—Church Review.

'We earnestly recommend its study and practice to all readers.'—Tablet.

'We have to thank Mr. Thompson for this translation of a valuable work which has long been popular in France.'—Dublin Review.

'A good translation.'—Mouth.

Also, by the same Author and Translator,

Devotion to the Nine Choirs of Holy Angels, and especially to the Angel Guardians. 3s.

'We congratulate Mr. Thompson on the way in which he has accomplished his task, and we earnestly hope that an increased devotion to the Holy Angels may be the reward of his labour of love.'—Tablet.

'A beautiful translation.'—Month.

'The translation is extremely well done.'—Weekly Register.

New Meditations for each Day in the Year, on the Life of our Lord Jesus Christ. By a Father of the Society of Jesus. With the imprimatur of the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster. New and improved edition.
Two vols. Cloth, 9s.; also in calf, 16s.; morocco, 17s.

'We can heartily recommend this book for its style and substance; it bears with it several strong recommendations. . . . It is solid and practical.'—Westminster Gazette.

'A work of great practical utility, and we give it our earnest recommendation.'—Weekly Register.

Spiritual Readings for Daily Use.* Selected from the Works of Saints and approved Writers of the Catholic Church.
Fcp. cloth, 3s. 6d.; red edges, 4s.

'Of the many volumes of meditations on sacred subjects which have appeared in the last few years, none has seemed to us so well adapted to its object as the one before us.'—Tablet.

'Admirable in every sense.'—Church Times.

'Many of the meditations are of great beauty. . . . They form, in fact, excellent little sermons, and we have no doubt will be largely used as such.'—Literary Churchman.

Reflections and Prayers for Holy Communion. Translated from the French. With Preface by the CARDINAL ARCHBISHOP OF WESTMINSTER. Fcp. 8vo, cloth, 4s. 6d.; bound, red edges, 5s.; calf, 9s.; morocco, 10s.

'The Archbishop has marked his approval of the work by writing a preface for it, and describes it as "a valuable addition to our books of devotion."'—Register.

'A book rich with the choicest and most profound Catholic devotions.'—Church Review.

Edited by the late Father FABER. New edition. Cloth, 4s. 6d.

'This excellent work has a twofold value, being both a biography and a volume of meditations. It contains an elaborate analysis of the wants, dangers, trials, and aspirations of the inner man, and supplies to the thoughtful and devout reader the most valuable instructions for the attainment of heavenly wisdom, grace, and strength.'—Catholic Times.

'A treatise of the very highest value.'—Month.

'The treatise is preceded by a short account of the writer's life, and has had the wonderful advantage of being edited by the late Father Faber.'—Weekly Register.

Causerie. By a Tertiary of the Order of St. Dominic. 4s.

'Good solid reading.'—Month.

'Well done and in a truly charitable spirit.'—Catholic Opinion.

'It treats the subject in so novel and forcible a light that we are fascinated in spite of ourselves, and irresistibly led on to follow its arguments and rejoice at its conclusions.'—Tablet.

Legends of our Lady and the Saints; or our Children's Book of Stories in Verse. Written for the Recitations of the Pupils of the Schools of the Holy Child Jesus, St. Leonard's-on-Sea. 2s. 6d.

'It is a beautiful religious idea that is realised in the Legends of our Lady and the Saints. The book forms a charming present for pious children.'—Tablet.

'The "Legends" are so beautiful that they ought to be read by all lovers of poetry.'—Bookseller.

'Graceful poems.'—Month.

of the Sacred Writers. With Notès, Chronological Tables, and Maps. Cloth, 2s.

'The compilers deserve great praise for the manner in which they have performed their task. We commend this little volume as well and carefully printed, and as furnishing its readers, moreover, with a great amount of useful information in the tables inserted at the end.'—Month.

'It is at once clear, complete, and beautiful.'—Catholic Opinion.

QUARTERLY SERIES.

VOLUMES PUBLISHED.

The Life and Letters of St. Francis Xavier.

By the Rev. H. J. COLERIDGE. Sec. edit. Two vols. 18s.

'We cordially thank Father Coleridge for a most valuable biography. . . . He has spared no pains to insure our having in good classical English a translation of all the letters which are extant. . . . A complete priest's manual might be compiled from them, entering as they do into all the details of a missionary's public and private life. . . . We trust we have stimulated our readers to examine them for themselves, and we are satisfied that they will return again and again to them as to a never-exhausted source of interest and edification.'—Tablet.

'A noble addition to our literature. . . . We offer our warmest thanks to Father Coleridge for this most valuable work. The letters, we need hardly say, will be found of great spiritual use, especially for missionaries and priests.'—Dublin Review.

'One of the most fascinating books we have met with for a long time.'—Catholic Opinion.

'Would that we had many more lives of saints like this! Father Coleridge has done great service to this branch of Catholic literature, not simply by writing a charming book, but especially by setting others an example of how a saint's life should be written.'—Westminster Gazette.

'This valuable book is destined, we feel assured, to take a high place among what we may term our English Catholic classics. . . . The great charm lies in the letters, for in them we have, in a far more forcible manner than any biographer could give them, the feelings, experiences, and aspirations of St. Francis Xavier as pictured by his own pen.'—Catholic Times.

'Father Coleridge does his own part admirably, and we shall not be surprised to find his book soon take its place as the standard Life of the saintly and illustrious Francis.'—Nation.

'Not only an interesting but a scholarly sketch of a life remarkable alike in itself and in its attendant circumstances. We hope the author will continue to labour in a department of literature for which he has here shown his aptitude. To find a saint's life which is at once moderate, historical, and appreciative is not a common thing.'—Saturday Review.

'Should be studied by all missionaries, and is worthy of a place in every Christian library.'—Church Herald.

The Life of St. Jane Frances Fremyot de Chantal. By EMILY BOWLES. With Preface by the Rev. H. J. COLERIDGE. Second edition. 5s. 6d.

'We venture to promise great pleasure and profit to the reader of this charming biography. It gives a complete and faithful portrait of one of the most attractive saints of the generation which followed the completion of the Council of Trent.'—Month.

'Sketched in a life-like manner, worthy of her well-earned reputation as a Catholic writer.'—Weekly Register.

'We have read it on and on with the fascination of a novel, and yet it is the life of a saint, described with a rare delicacy of touch and feeling such as is seldom met with.'—Tablet.

'A very readable and interesting compilation. . . . The author has done her work faithfully and conscientiously.'—Athenæum.

'Full of incident, and told in a style so graceful and felicitous that it wins upon the reader with every page.'—Nation.

'Miss Bowles has done her work in a manner which we cannot better commend than by expressing a desire that she may find many imitators. She has endued her materials with life, and clothed them with a language and a style of which we do not know what to admire most—the purity, the grace, the refinement, or the elegance. If our readers wish to know the value and the beauty of this book, they can do no better than get it and read it.'—Westminster Gazette.

'One of the most charming and delightful volumes which has issued from the press for many years. Miss Bowles has accomplished her task faithfully and happily, with simple grace and unpretentious language, and a winning manner which, independently of her subject, irresistibly carries us along.'—Ulster Examiner.

The History of the Sacred Passion. From the Spanish of Father LUIS DE LA PALMA, of the Society of Jesus. The Translation revised and edited by the Rev. H. J. COLERIDGE. Third edition. 7s. 6d.

'A work long held in great and just repute in Spain. It opens a mine of wealth to one's soul. Though there are many works on the Passion in English, probably none will be found so generally useful both for spiritual reading and meditation. We desire to see it widely circulated.'—Tablet.

'A sterling work of the utmost value, proceeding from the pen of a great theologian, whose piety was as simple and tender as his learning and culture were profound and exquisite. It is a rich storehouse for contemplation on the great mystery of our Redemption, and one of those books which every Catholic ought to read for himself.'—Weekly Register.

'The most wonderful work upon the Passion that we have ever read. To us the charm lies in this, that it is entirely theological. It is made use of largely by those who give the Exercises of St. Ignatius; it is, as it were, the flesh upon the skeleton of the Exercises. Never has the Passion been meditated upon so before. . . . If any one wishes to understand the Passion of our Lord in its fulness, let him procure this book.'—Dublin Review.

'We have not read a more thoughtful work on our Blessed Lord's Passion.

It is a complete storehouse of matter for meditation, and for sermons on that divine mystery.'—Catholic Opinion.

'The book is—speaking comparatively of human offerings—a magnificent offering to the Crucified, and to those who wish to make a real study of the Cross will be a most precious guide.'—Church Review.

Ierne of Armorica: a Tale of the Time of Chlovis. By J. C. BATEMAN. 6s. 6d.

'We know of few tales of the kind that can be ranked higher than the beautiful story before us. The author has hit on the golden mean between an over-display of antiquarianism and an indolent transfer of modern modes of action and thought to a distant time. The descriptions are masterly, the characters distinct, the interest unflagging. We may add that the period is one of those which may be said to be comparatively unworked.'—Month.

'A volume of very great interest and very great utility. As a story it is sure to give much delight, while, as a story founded on historical fact, it will benefit all by its very able reproduction of very momentous scenes. . . . The book is excellent. If we are to have a literature of fiction at all, we hope it will include many like volumes.'—Dublin Review.

'Although a work of fiction, it is historically correct, and the author portrays with great skill the manners and customs of the times of which he professes to give a description. In reading this charming tale we seem to be taken by the hand by the writer, and made to assist at the scenes which he describes.'—Tablet.

'The author of this most interesting tale has hit the happy medium between a display of antiquarian knowledge and a mere reproduction in distant ages of commonplace modern habits of thought. The descriptions are excellent, the characters well drawn, and the subject itself is very attractive, besides having the advantage of not having been written threadbare.'—Westminster Gazette.

'The tale is excessively interesting, the language appropriate to the time and rank of the characters, the style flowing and easy, and the narrative leads one on and on until it becomes a very difficult matter to lay the book down until it is finished. . . . It is a valuable addition to Catholic fictional literature.'—Catholic Times.

'A very pretty historico-ecclesiastical novel of the times of Chlovis. It is full of incident, and is very pleasant reading.'—Literary Churchman.

The Life of the Blessed John Berchmans. By the Rev. FRANCIS GOLDIE, S.J. 6s.

'Drawn up with a vigour and freedom which show great power of biographical writing.'—Dublin Review.

'One of the most interesting of all.'—Weekly Register.

'Unhesitatingly we say that it is the very best Life of Blessed John

'Is of great literary merit, the style being marked by elegance and a complete absence of redundancy.'—Cork Examiner.

'This delightful and edifying volume is of the deepest interest. The perusal will afford both pleasure and profit.'—Church Herald.

The Life of the Blessed Peter Favre, of the Society of Jesus, First Companion of St. Ignatius Loyola. From the Italian of Father GIUSEPPE BOERO, of the same Society. With Preface by the Rev. H. J. COLERIDGE. 6s. 6d.

This Life has been written on the occasion of the beatification of the Ven. Peter Favre, and contains the Memoriale or record of his private thoughts and meditations, written by himself.

'At once a book of spiritual reading, and also an interesting historical narrative. The Memoriale, or Spiritual Diary, is here translated at full length, and is the most precious portion of one of the most valuable biographies we know.'—Tablet.

'A perfect picture drawn from the life, admirably and succinctly told. The Memoriale will be found one of the most admirable epitomes of sound devotional reading.'—Weekly Register.

'Full of interest, instruction, and example.'—Cork Examiner.

'One of the most interesting to the general reader of the entire series up to this time.'—Nation.

'This wonderful diary, the Memoriale, has never been published before, and we are much mistaken if it does not become a cherished possession to thoughtful Catholics.'—Month.

An old English version. Edited, with Preface, by the Rev. H. J. COLERIDGE. 6s.

'The Catholic world must feel grateful to Father Coleridge for this excellent and compendious edition. The subjects treated of possess at this moment a special interest. . . . The Preface by Father Coleridge is interesting and well written, and we cordially recommend the book to the perusal of all.'—Tablet.

'This is a most interesting book. . . . Father Coleridge gives a very useful preface summarising the contents.'—Weekly Register.

'We have seldom taken up a book in which we have become at once so deeply interested. It will suit any one; it will teach all; it will confirm any who require that process; and it will last and be read when other works are quite forgotten.'—Catholic Times.

'Edited and published with the utmost care and the most perfect literary taste, this volume adds one more gem to the treasury of English Catholic literature.'—New York Catholic World.
